Allies strengthen forces on all fronts

Nato puts 600 planes into air war

By MICHAEL EVANS, IAN BRODIE AND TOM WALKER

NATO reinforcements, adding another 90 aircraft and an extra carrier for the attacks on Yugoslavia, were unveiled yesterday as the latest evidence of the alliance governments' resolve to maintain a long-haul air campaign.

Although the number of troops deployed to Albania and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia could also more than double in the next few weeks, Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary, reaffirmed that there would be no U-turn in Nato's policy to pursue the air campaign in preference to a ground offensive.

Sending in ground forces, he said, would cause casualties on both sides. However, he said Britain had troops on short notice to move to Macedonia to reinforce the 4,300 already there, and their possible deployment was "under daily review". He was referring to the 4,000-man Irish Guards battle group in Germany.

Underlining the growing concern about the fate of ethnic Albanians inside Kosovo, Mr Cook said he had been told that 400,000 people were now living in the woods and mountains, hiding from the Yugoslav forces.

He added that Hashim Thaci, the leading Kosovo Liberation Army figure who headed the Albanian delegation at the Rambouillet peace talks, had phoned him from Kosovo to back the air campaign. Mr Thaci had also described how people were hiding in terror in Kosovo, with little food and in bleak conditions. Snow had fallen that morning in the hills, Mr Cook said.

The extensive reinforcements, consisting of 82 more US aircraft and the Royal Navy aircraft carrier HMS Invincible, with seven Sea Harriers, accompanied by the destroyer HMS Newcastle and the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Fort Austin, were a "visible demonstration of our commitment to complete the job of forcing President Milosevic to reverse the ethnic cleansing of Kosovo", Mr Cook said.

The additional aircraft will bring Nato's air armada total to more than 600 planes.

Despite the continuing focus on air power, American officials confirmed that there were "standby" plans for the use of ground troops in Kosovo, but insisted an intensified air campaign would be sufficient to meet Nato's military objectives.

David Leavy, for the US National Security Council, said Nato had done an assessment for ground forces in a hostile environment which could be updated quickly. He added: "There has not been a request for ground troops from the Nato commanders and President Clinton has no intention of introducing them, but that planning remains on the shelf if necessary."

The same message came from William Cohen, the US Defence Secretary, who said that the idea of ground troops remained hypothetical, but the plans could be updated fairly quickly.

General Hugh Shelton,

While we keep all options under review at all times, that is not our plan.

He added: "A land invasion would be a massive undertaking and would take time to assemble. The casualties would potentially be large. And the civilian population would be at Milosevic's mercy."

However, Paskal Milo, the Albanian Foreign Minister, made it clear yesterday in a televised link-up to a press conference at the Ministry of Defence in London that his government would support Nato using the country's territory and airspace for any action against the Yugoslav forces in Kosovo.

He said: "The Albanian Government is ready to accept other ground troops from Nato. We now have decided to give Nato the rights to control all our airspace, ports and any other kind of military infrastructure in Albania."

Slavko Curuvija, a newspaper editor and one of Mr Milosevic's most outspoken critics, was shot dead yesterday, reviving speculation that he was a central figure in a planned coup against the Yugoslav President.

On a day when an air of tension spread over Belgrade, the embattled authorities diverted attention from the first chilling signs of desperation in the regime by showing the confession on state television of an Australian aid worker, who admitted to performing undercover intelligence tasks in Kosovo.

The spy charges against Steve Pratt, who faces up to 20 years in jail under Yugoslavia's martial law rules, provided a welcome fillip for Serbs on their Easter Sunday, the most important day in the Orthodox calendar.

Nato said that bombing was restrained yesterday partly in deference to the Orthodox Easter, but poor weather also played a part.

Yesterday the Pope expressed his fellow feeling for "our Orthodox brothers" in Yugoslavia.

In a special address, he said that a yearning for real peace was "pervading the world as this millennium draws to a close".

Tories poised to back elected Lords

By JAMES LANDALE
POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

TORY chiefs will this week give the clearest signal yet that the party is on the brink of backing radical proposals for a directly elected House of Lords.

A commission set up by William Hague will conclude that a future second chamber must be at the very least predominantly elected. That is in stark contrast to the Government's apparent favoured option of a largely nominated second chamber with a small indirectly elected element.

The commission, chaired by the former Lord Chancellor Lord Mackay of Clashfern, is also expected to rule out any reduction of the upper house's powers to act as a check on the executive.

The Government gave a strong hint in its recent White Paper on the Lords that a reformed chamber should have its powers trimmed to avoid encroaching on the Commons' constitutional superiority.

Ministers fear that a second chamber with too much democratic legitimacy will repeatedly challenge the Commons and cause legislative gridlock.

According to senior Tory sources, the Mackay report, to be published on Friday, will put forward two broad options for a reformed House of Lords: either a predominantly or wholly elected upper chamber.

Although the Commission is technically non-prescriptive and does not de Mr Hague's hands, it paves the way for the Tory leader to back a democratic upper house.

"[The new policy] may include 100 per cent of Mackay, or just part of it," one Shadow Cabinet member said. "But it would be very unlikely not to include any Mackay at all."

SPORT: THE WEEKEND'S BIG RESULTS

Rugby Union:

Scotland took the Five Nations' Championship after an injury-time try gave Wales a 32-31 victory over England. Scotland had beaten France 36-22 on Saturday.

Football:

Newcastle United booked their ticket to FA Cup Final, beating Tottenham Hotspur 2-0 in extra time. They must wait to learn who they will meet at Wembley on May 22. Manchester United and Arsenal drew their semi-final 0-0 after extra time and will replay on Wednesday.

The Old Firm will meet again in the Scottish Cup Final after Rangers beat St Johnstone 2-0. Celtic beat Dundee United by a similar margin on Saturday.

Motor-racing:

Mika Hakkinen repeated his success of last year to win the Brazilian Grand Prix for McLaren. Michael Schumacher was second and Heinz-Harald Frentzen third.

Cricket:

Boxing:

Prince Naseem Hamed retained his WBO featherweight title when his fight against Paul Ingle was stopped in the eleventh round.

Horse-racing:

Bobbyjo, ridden by Paul Carberry, won the Grand National at 10-1, followed by Blue Charm (25-1). Call It A Day (7-1) and Addington Boy (10-1)

Princess Margaret recovers after scalding feet in bath

By ALAN HAMILTON

PRINCESS MARGARET is bedridden and receiving regular medical attention at Windsor Castle a month after burning her feet in a scalding bath while on holiday in the Caribbean. Buckingham Palace confirmed yesterday.

Fears for the health of the Queen's 68-year-old sister were renewed after the accident in the Princess's holiday home on the island of Mustique last month, but Palace officials stressed last night that there was no question of her life being in danger.

The Palace said that the Princess was "in good spirits", and had been told by her doctors to rest. "She is getting some nursing care, helping her change her dressings, and the burns are responding to treatment. She was seen by a local doctor in Mustique and came back to London a week after the accident. She is now recuperating at Windsor, but these things do take some time to heal," the Palace said.

'Any serious burn to the feet, hands or face is considered of great medical importance and usually treated in hospital'

Officials could not say whether the Princess would be well enough to attend the wedding of her nephew Prince Edward to Sophie Rhys-Jones at Windsor on June 19, but she is thought certain to cancel a planned appearance this week at the christening in London of a grandson of King Constantine of Greece, at which Prince William will become a godfather for the first time. The Princess has undertaken no official duties since February.

In February 1998 the Princess suffered a mild stroke while holidaying on Mustique and on her return to Britain spent longer than expected under observation in the King Edward VII Hospital for Officers in Central London.

Lady Glenconner, a close friend, who travelled with the Princess from Mustique last month, said the accident had happened when the Princess sat on the edge of a bath in her holiday home, Les Jolies Eaux. She had swivelled her legs into the bath, not realising it was full of scalding water.

The Princess's cries for help had at first gone unheeded, but she was eventually rescued by staff and examined by a local doctor. She felt well enough to remain on Mustique for another week.

"The Princess has been in bed for the past month following the accident; burns like that do not heal easily, especially as one gets older. However, she is well in herself," Lady Glenconner said. "I have spoken to her several times since, she is fine."

The Princess returned initially to her apartments at Kensington Palace, and felt well enough to join the Queen and other members of the Royal Family for their Easter break at Windsor. But she apparently underestimated the severity of her injuries, was unable to join in family gatherings and meals, and has remained in bed at the castle.

Doctors believe that the Princess's burns may be slow to heal because of her age and long addiction to cigarettes, which she is now said to have given up but which are likely to have caused permanent damage to her circulation.

Labour sources dismissed the new Tory approach. They said that the Tories were learning the wrong lessons from Labour's renaissance under Mr Blair.

Bafta loves Bess more than Will

Elizabethan film rivalry is rekindled at British awards, reports Carol Midgley

IN A display of the revenge that was such a popular feature of the Elizabethan theatre, the Australian actress Cate Blanchett beat Gwyneth Paltrow to the Best Actress award at the 51st British Academy Awards last night.

Miss Blanchett won the award for her portrayal of Elizabeth I in the British movie Elizabeth, while Miss Paltrow, who wept as she accepted her Oscar award for Best Actress for her role in Shakespeare in Love last month, went home empty-handed. Elizabeth I emerged as the main winner at the awards as the film world continued its love affair with 16th century England.

Dame Judi Dench compounded her Oscars triumph by winning the Best Supporting Actress award for her eight-minute performance of the older Queen Elizabeth in Shakespeare in Love.

The two films dominated the awards ceremony. Shakespeare in Love won four awards, including Best Film, while Elizabeth won five, including Most Outstanding British Film of the Year.

Another Elizabeth, Elizabeth Taylor, was given the top award of the evening, the Academy Fellowship for her lifetime achievement in cinema.

There was more celebration for Roberto Benigni, who won the Best Actor award for his performance in the Holocaust film La Vita e Bella. Last month, when he won an Oscar for the role, he kissed the feet of Martin Scorsese. The Best Supporting Actor award went to Geoffrey Rush, who played an Elizabethan producer in Shakespeare in Love.

There was further disappointment for Michael Caine, who had been ignored in the Oscar nominations. Although he was nominated for Best Actor for his portrayal of a sleazy showbusiness agent in Little Voice, he missed out again.

Peter Weir was named Best Director for The Truman Show, the American film which also won Best Original Screenplay. Primary Colors, regarded as based on President Clinton and his wife Hillary, won Best Adapted Screenplay.

Elizabeth won three further awards, for Best Music, Best Cinematography and Best Makeup and Hair, while David Gamble picked up a further award for Shakespeare in Love for Best Editing.

The organisers of Bafta had made an effort to make this year's ceremony more glamorous than previous events in an attempt to raise its profile as the British Oscars. Guests walked up a red-carpeted promenade as the public watched outside the British Design Centre in Islington, North London. It was thought that the vista would be more television-friendly than the usual view at the rear of the Grosvenor House Hotel in Park Lane where the event has been held previously.

The soccer star Vinnie Jones arrived with his wife to celebrate Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels, the film in which he starred, winning the Orange Audience award. Saving Private Ryan, directed by Steven Spielberg, had a disappointing evening. Despite many nominations, it won only two awards, Best Sound and Best Special Effects.

Gwyneth Paltrow walked off with an Oscar but missed out on personal glory at the Baftas for her starring role in Shakespeare in Love

Elizabethan drama of cinema rivals

James Christopher, the Times film critic, found last night's awards were not so much a competition as a blood bath

THE moment Shkhar Kapur's film Elizabeth and John Madden's Shakespeare in Love were nominated for this year's top movie awards, there was never going to be anything but an unhealthy sense of rivalry between them.

At the Oscars last month, one of the most bitter side-shows was betting on which of the two ostensibly British films, featuring the character of Elizabeth I, would pick up the more glamorous statuettes. Or whether they would contrive to cancel each other out. In the event, it wasn't so much a competition as a blood-bath. Madden's Shakespeare in Love slaughtered all comers, and comprehensively humiliated the awardless Elizabeth (a Make-Up award hardly counts).

There was some compensation for poor Shkhar Kapur and his cohorts at the Baftas last night when Elizabeth dramatically picked off five awards against Shakespeare in Love's four. But Kapur's sense of vindication must be tempered by the fact that the top award — Best Film — went to his rival, while Elizabeth has had to make do with the significantly lesser award for Outstanding British Film. The sweetest moment was almost certainly enjoyed by Cate Blanchett, who played the title role in Elizabeth. She won the Best Actress award when the massed ranks of celebrities were putting their umbrellas up in expectation of yet another watery acceptance speech by red hot favourite Gwyneth Paltrow.

Both Elizabeth and Shakespeare in Love clearly deserved their awards. The rivalry has been something of a farce. They work on such entirely different levels that comparisons are at best unhelpful, at worst, damaging.

What the Baftas have implicitly acknowledged last night is the art-house ambitions of Kapur's vertiginous conspiracy movie. Full of baroque angles and festering melodrama, the film is a fascinating exploration of the psychological power-play in Elizabeth I's court.

The Oscars favoured Shakespeare in Love simply because it is a cracking commercial comedy with one of the wittiest scripts of the decade. You expect nothing less from a combination such as Marc Norman and Tom Stoppard.

Academy chief to sue for unfair dismissal

By RAYMOND SNOODY
MEDIA EDITOR

AS THE Bafta awards were being handed out last night, the former chief executive of the British Academy of Film and Television Arts was planning a case of unfair dismissal and breach of contract against it. Jane Clarke is expected to allege cronyism and failure to maximise money from sponsorship.

Miss Clarke joined the academy last year, on a salary of £70,000, from her job as deputy director of the British Film Institute. Her brief was to modernise an organisation accused of being an "old boy network", providing perks for senior members alongside its job of promoting excellence in British film and television.

At the end of the year, Miss Clarke, 47, was dismissed

from re-entering the Bafta building. A statement was issued saying that her contract had been terminated by "a unanimous decision of the board". Miss Clarke has instigated employment tribunal proceedings. She will tell the tribunal that it was made to look as if she had been guilty of gross misconduct. She will allege that after her departure her personal mail was opened.

She has told friends that she believes one factor involved in her dismissal was the unpopularity caused by her discovery that quantities of wine were disappearing from Bafta's headquarters in Piccadilly.

Miss Clarke alleges that her dismissal came soon after she drew to the attention of the chairman, the film and television consumer Tim Angel, her belief that the organisation had not been maximising the money it could have raised from sponsorship of awards such as last night's.

Mr Angel declined to comment, other than to say that Miss Clarke's action would be vigorously defended.

BALKANS WAR: NATO UNITY

Blair sees new world order in Kosovo conflict

BY JAMES LANDALE
POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

TONY BLAIR today calls for a "new internationalism" in which the world community never again tolerates the brutal repression of an ethnic group by a dictator struggling to remain in power.

In an article for Newsweek magazine, the Prime Minister suggests that Nato's action in Kosovo could be a model for future international relations.

Mr Blair says: "This is a conflict we are fighting not for territory but for values, for a new internationalism where the brutal repression of whole ethnic groups will no longer be tolerated, for a world where those responsible for such crimes have nowhere to hide."

He adds: "We are fighting for a world where dictators are no longer able to visit horrific punishments on their own people in order to stay in power."

Establishing the principle that outside countries can intervene in a sovereign state to halt "ethnic cleansing" would mark a radical shift in the basic norms of international relations and Mr Blair's remarks will provoke unease among many countries. Some Western diplomats are privately concerned at the consequences of Nato's pro-active stance and emphasise that the aggressive action in Kosovo is a unique situation.

Mr Blair also uses the article to mount a strong defence of Nato's airstrikes against Kosovo. He acknowledged there would be "the usual barrage of criticism" for the action. But the West had learned from "bitter experience" 60 years ago not to appease dictators such as President Milosevic.

Defending the airstrikes, Mr Blair insists the Government was right to be "cautious" about a ground offensive. "Of course ground forces will be necessary in Kosovo to give the refugees the confidence to return to their homes

Tony Benn at the Trafalgar Square rally yesterday organised by the Committee for Peace in the Balkans to oppose the Nato bombing campaign in safety," he says. "But that is very different from fighting our way in. While we keep all options under review... that is not our plan. A land invasion would be a massive undertaking and would take time to assemble. The casualties would potentially be large. And the civilian population would be at Milosevic's mercy." Mr Blair, who is expected to address MPs tomorrow when the Commons returns from its Easter break, said Nato would continue attacking until it succeeded, and insisted the airstrikes were "taking their toll" on the Yugoslav Army. More than 2,000 anti-bombing protesters gathered in Trafalgar Square in central London yesterday to demonstrate against the Nato airstrikes. Several left-wing Labour MPs including Tony Benn, joined the protest which was organised by the Committee for Peace in the Balkans.

Mr Benn said: "We are saying, stop the bombing now.

And we are saying that all money and effort now devoted to war should be diverted to the enormous humanitarian problems that not only concern the people of Kosovo, but the people of Yugoslavia who are being bombed."

Germans fear Schröder is America's tool

How much longer will the Germans put up with the war? The easy answer is that Gerhard Schröder, the German Chancellor, is in the war, for better or for worse, and is determined to show himself as good an ally as Britain.

Public opinion is still on his side—57 per cent of Germans support a continuation of the airstrikes until President Milosevic stops all military action in Kosovo.

Yet alliances are dynamic and in war—despite the obligatory pretence of unity—the terms are being constantly renegotiated. Both France and Germany are unhappy about America's control of intelligence collected by satellites.

Nato quickly denied reports from Washington that France was being cut out of an information loop for fear that intelligence would get back to the Serbs. Not unnaturally, the French were deeply offended at the suggestion.

The nervousness over US intelligence policy is also felt by the Germans. Certainly the Chancellor's office was upset that it had no idea about the fate of 30,000

ly by the resignation of Oskar Lafontaine, his former Finance Minister.

As far as Germany is concerned, it is now very much Oskar Who? But the Social Democratic Party conference still aches for him, for his left-wing certainties and his rhetorical passion. The party does not love or even much like Herr Schröder. They will vote for him today, but in the manner of dutiful children taking tea with a maiden aunt: it is something that they have to do.

First, however, they will give him an earful on Kosovo, which the party regards as an illegal war. Such is the strength of feeling that some 30 per cent of the delegates are threatening to abstain from the vote for Herr Schröder. Party delegates want guarantees of parliamentary approval before any fresh military steps are taken: they will demand (and receive) a pledge that ground troops will not be placed before a peace treaty is in place and they will want reassurances that there is a way of ending the war on sensible terms.

The pacifists in the party do not have a strong champion now that Herr Lafontaine has taken early retirement and they are in no position to dictate terms. But if Herr Schröder really wants to be party leader as well as Chancellor, he will have to incorporate some of the party's scepticism about the war into his politics; that is the price of their support.

The premise that war consolidates the power of domestic leaders is shaky. Naturally, war boosts the profile of defence ministers—Herr Scharping has become, in effect, the second-most important figure in the Government and in the party—and of foreign ministers.

But the Chancellor's approval rating has slipped 11 per cent since the beginning of this month. Only 50 per cent of Germans believe that he is doing a good job. The Chancellor looks as if he is in command but increasingly Germans think that he is taking orders from Washington.

When Helmut Kohl, his predecessor, was in power he always created the illusion that he was consulting with US Presidents on an equal basis. War reveals the true distribution of power within an alliance and it has already become plain that Herr Schröder is not high on the list of President Clinton's priority calls. This could prove dangerous.

The deepest anxiety of Germans is that the United States will lead them, against their will, into a conflict with Russia. That was the trigger for the anti-American protests of the 1980s.

If the Kosovo war continues without result—that is if Mr Milosevic sits firm—if his police units continue to terrorise and slice up Kosovo—then something similar could happen again.

INSIDE GERMANY

BY ROGER BOYES

refugees who disappeared after arriving at the border even though US satellites could have kept them in the picture.

"There is a degree of dissatisfaction," admits Walter Stiltz, the junior Defence Minister. His boss, Rudolf Scharping, emphasises that Nato should be "more open and more offensive", meaning that the United States should not keep secrets from its allies.

The Germans are going to deploy a second battery of unmanned drones which could provide some tactical information but they are no substitute for the panorama provided by satellites. An old, expensive idea, for a joint Franco-German satellite system, may be revived but it will come too late for this war.

The underlying fear is that America is beginning to fight a separate war. There is probably nothing in it but the mere whisper of abandonment is enough to sap the authority of the Chancellor who has yet to earn his spurs as an international statesman.

Today he faces his first open challenge on Kosovo when he stands for election as chairman of the Social Democratic Party. He is supposed to fill the gap left so strangely and so sudden-

HELP PROTECT YOUR FAMILY'S FINANCIAL FUTURE

Could your family get by without you?

It's the question that no parent wants to ask themselves. Yet it is probably the single most important question you should be asking—how would your family cope financially if anything happened to you or your partner?

Bereavement in itself is hard to cope with, so the last thing you'd want your family to experience at such a difficult time is financial hardship. After all, bills will still need to be paid. School expenses will still need to be met. Holidays, Christmas and birthday presents will still need to be bought.

THE PRACTICAL ANSWER

The easiest and most affordable way to help protect your family's future is with term assurance—a type of life insurance that covers you for the period of your choice. Legal & General's Family Protection Plan is just such a policy. It pays out the lump sum you select at the start of the term should you die whilst covered. What's more, one or both parents can be covered and you choose exactly how long you want cover to last—until your children grow up and become independent, for example. And, as the table opposite shows, policies can be arranged from as little as £5 a month—that's less than you spend on your daily newspaper.

Of course, you could rely on state benefit—which in the current tax year is £83.55 a week for a widow and two children. Hardly sufficient when you consider that it could cost over £300 a week to pay someone to do all the jobs a parent at home does—childcare, cleaning, cooking and so on.

HOW MUCH COVER DO YOU NEED?

Research shows that, on average, it costs £90,000 over 18 years to bring up your children*. So as a guide, the Life Insurance Market Research Association estimates you should aim for life cover of around 15 times your household income to provide financial security if one partner were to die. The table opposite gives you an idea of the cost of various levels of cover. And if your circumstances change (if you have another child, for example), it's easy to alter the amount of cover you have.

Naturally, the older you get, the more expensive life assurance becomes. So it's well worth taking out cover as soon as you can. Especially as your Family Protection Plan premiums are guaranteed never to rise over the entire term (unless the Indexation option is selected or you choose to increase the level of cover).

CHOOSE THE OPTIONS THAT SUIT YOU

Another great advantage of Legal & General's plan is its flexibility. For example you can choose from a range of optional extras for even greater peace of mind:

Critical Illness Cover—the sum assured is paid on diagnosis of a pre-defined serious illness, such as a heart attack or stroke.

Terminal Illness Cover—the sum assured is paid on diagnosis of a pre-defined terminal illness where your life expectancy is less than 12 months, but no later than 18 months before the policy expires.

Waiver of premium—Your premiums are paid if you can't work due to ill-health.

Indexation—Allows you to maintain the value of your sum insured by increasing it, along with your premiums, in line with inflation.

BALKANS WAR: MURDER IN BELGRADE

Gunmen kill leading Milosevic critic

Editor is shot dead on day that aid worker 'confesses' to spying charge, reports Tom Walker in Belgrade

ONE of President Milosevic's most outspoken critics, Slayko Curuvija, a prominent newspaper editor, was shot dead yesterday, reviving speculation that he was a central figure in the planned coup.

On a day when an air of tension spread over Belgrade, the embattled authorities diverted attention from the first chilling signs of desperation in the region by showing the confession on state television of an aid worker, who apparently admitted performing undercover intelligence tasks in Kosovo.

The spy charges against Steve Pratt, who faces up to 20 years in jail under Yugoslavia's martial law, provided a welcome fillip for Serbs on their Easter Day, the most important day in the Orthodox calendar.

A sense of national injustice was heightened by state media reports that six civilians, including a one-year-old girl and her father, had been killed by a Nato missile in northern Kosovo.

The cold-blooded murder of Mr Curuvija, however, sent fear racing through the dwindling numbers of independent journalists left in Belgrade.

Witnesses said that at least two gunmen shot Mr Curuvija in the back of the head as he walked through a secluded courtyard towards his block of flats in the late afternoon. His partner, Branka Prpa, was struck over the head but recovered and raised the alarm.

His newspaper, Dnevni Telegraph, was banned briefly last October after it was accused of raising panic during the first threatened air raids against Belgrade. He was then heavily fined for an article in a sister publication, The European, that was critical of Mr Milosevic's decade in power. He faced a prison sentence of five months, but was freed pending appeal.

Mr Curuvija was once a close associate of Mr Milosevic's wife, Mira Markovic, and also had good connections within the secret police network. The rumours of his involvement in a coup plot stemmed from his friendship with Mr Milosevic's former head of security, Jovica Stanisic, who was dismissed by Mr Milosevic in late October.

Various human rights groups, including the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, were concerned for Mr Curuvija's safety. The European article appeared a week before Mr Stanisic's departure. It was regarded as the most virulent and detailed attack yet made on Mr Milosevic, and many commentators at the time said Mr Curuvija would not have dared publish it without backers in high places. His prison sentence stemmed from another story, concerning the murder of a doctor and the activities of Milovan Bojic, the Deputy Prime Minister, that was published this year by Dnevni Telegraph.

For his part, Mr Pratt, who delivered his televised confession in a dull monotone, bore no obvious signs of beatings, but he was slumped in his chair and looked tired and drained of emotion.

He sat by a high table, on which a small placard described him as "Major Steve Pratt", his former title in the Australian Army.

He had been arrested while trying to cross into Croatia 11 days ago with a younger colleague, Peter Wallace. Both men worked for CARE Australia, one of the most established non-governmental organisations in Yugoslavia, and one that has built up a relatively good relationship with the authorities thanks to its work with Serbian refugees from Croatia and Bosnia.

The men had been based in Kosovo. With the permission of the Ministry for Refugees, they were on their way to Montenegro. Chris Lamb, the Australian Ambassador to Belgrade, had spent two days camped on the Croatian border attempting to get back into Yugoslavia in a frantic search for his subjects, but when he finally crossed on Friday he could find no trace of them.

Alexander Downer, Australia's Foreign Affairs Minister, last week made a formal complaint to the Yugoslav authorities, who eventually admitted that they were holding the men but refused to say why or where.

"When I came to Yugoslavia I performed some intelligence tasks in this country by using the cover of CARE Australia. My concentration was on Kosovo and some effects of the bombing," said Mr Pratt in the confession.

"I misused my Yugoslav citizen staff in the acquisition of information. I realised that damage was done to this country by these actions for which I am greatly sorry. I also did, and I still do, condemn the bombing of this country."

He did not elaborate further and state television then cut to another story.

Samira, Mr Pratt's pregnant Yemeni wife, has been waiting in the Hungarian capital, Budapest, for news of her husband. Yesterday she was understood to be too distressed to comment.

Exiled Prince in peace plea

Easter message highlights civilian suffering, writes Eve-Ann Prentice

THE exiled head of the Yugoslav Royal Family vowed yesterday never to return to his country while "that bastard" Slobodan Milosevic remained in power.

Speaking amid hundreds of applauding Serbs as they marked Orthodox Easter Day in London yesterday, Crown Prince Alexander Karadjordjevic called on Nato to halt its bombing campaign in Serbia, saying that the air raids were merely cementing President Milosevic's hold on power.

The Prince, born at Claridge's in a room declared Yugoslav for a day, is the eldest son of King Peter II, who fled from the Nazis in 1941 and has spent his life in exile.

He and his wife, Crown Princess Katherine, were welcomed as they entered the Serbian Community Centre in Ladbroke Grove, beside St Sava's Serbian Orthodox Church. The Prince said: "I am against the bombing because it is hurting my people which practises ethnic cleansing. To be a big nation, we must respect all nations. Easter is very special and to be true Christians you must recognise everyone."

Prince Alexander has written to Tony Blair, President Clinton and President Chirac of France calling for an end to Nato's airstrikes. He said that the action had "turned into a real nightmare the lives of ordinary Yugoslav citizens, the people who are not guilty of anything. Civilian casualties are mounting and the scars will take generations to heal."

He repeated in his letter a common accusation among Serbs that Nato has double standards: "You will recall that when, in 1995, the Serbs were ethnically cleansed from Croatia and Western Bosnia, no one came to their rescue."

Earlier, at least 1,000 people at St Sava's heard a message from the Serbian Orthodox Patriarch, Pavle. He called for peaceful co-existence in Kosovo and condemned the Nato

BALKANS WAR: RUSSIA

Cossacks ride in to join Serb 'brothers'

Russian media dismiss President's anti-Nato rhetoric as ploy to avert impeachment, Anna Blundy writes

RUSSIAN Cossacks joined Serbian resistance to the Nato bombardments at the weekend, gathering on Belgrade's bridges to form a human shield. The Cossacks are the first Russians actively to support Yugoslavia in defiance of President Yeltsin's assurances that Russia will not be drawn into the Balkans conflict.

"Russian love and Russian power are with you," one Cossack was reported as saying to a group of Serbs, who chanted Russian Russia! Russia! in return.

Last month Cossack leaders, known as atamans, ominously pledged to mobilise 5,000 volunteers to defend the Serbs against Nato raids.

With their distinctive dress, tall lambskin hats, tsarist tunics and cavalry sabres, the Orthodox Cossacks are a fitting symbol of Russia's ancient links with their Slav brothers.

Almost annihilated under Communism, Russia's three million Cossacks were officially rehabilitated as a people by Mikhail Gorbachev and their revival has been a source of pride and concern ever since.

The militarist and nationalist Union of Cossacks was reformed in 1990 and is taken seriously enough for all Russian presidential candidates to have felt compelled visit Novocherkassk, the southern Cossack capital before the 1996 election.

The Cossacks were Russia's southern border guards for two centuries before the communist revolution. Although they are often romanticised, their glorious past is largely mythical, a nationalistic superiority complex developed in the 19th Century when they felt their influence waning.

In the meantime, the Rus-

As Russian anger grows against the build-up of Nato forces, a gunner in a Lynx helicopter of the 659 Squadron, Army Air Corps, keeps vigil on the Macedonian border

sian media agree that Mr Yeltsin's sabre-ranting against Nato has proved successful in staving off imminent impeachment proceedings against him. While his threats of world war and promises of an alliance with Serbia have worried the West, they were meant for domestic consumption.

Referring to the announcement on Friday, later retracted, that Russian nuclear missiles had been aimed at Nato countries, Kommersant daily's headline read: "The Rocket Trick — Yeltsin strikes a blow at impeachment." The front-page photograph showed Mr Yeltsin throwing his arms out like a successful magician.

Mr Yeltsin appealed to the pro-Serb feelings of the majority of his countrymen in an effort to endear himself to the communists and nationalists who want to get rid of him, and it seems to have worked.

Commentators concur that the impeachment vote against the President, on charges including the use of force in Chechnya and the illegal disintegration of the Soviet Union, is likely to be postponed indefinitely.

Few Russians take Mr Yeltsin's threats against Nato seriously at face value. Komsomolskaya Pravda asks: "Eleven minutes to nuclear war or was the chief just joking again?" About 76 per cent of people polled by Sogodnya newspaper do not think aiming missiles at the West is a good idea in any case. But nobody believes that his comments were the ramblings of an ailing old man.

The President was up to something. Though the missile "misunderstanding" and Mr Yeltsin's threat of possible Russian military involvement in the Kosovo crisis were eventually explained away by frantic Kremlin aides, the delay was long enough to change the President's image in the eyes of his people. "Even though the rockets were not redirected, the fact is that this high-level leak took place and was not quickly retracted. This means it was intended to put pressure on Nato to improve Mr Yeltsin's popularity before the impeachment vote," says Yevgeny Zhuravayev, Obshchaya Gazeta's international affairs editor. "I am sure it was a bluff, but there is a lot of pressure on Yeltsin to take a tougher stance." Mr Yeltsin's demands that Yevgeny Primakov, the Prime Minister, even the threat of impeachment or face the sack also appear to have had the desired effect.

Mr Primakov appeared on television over the weekend and wholeheartedly backed the President, warning of national instability should impeachment go ahead. Analysts agree that the Duma vote seems unlikely as Mr Yeltsin's brilliant political manoeuvring pays off yet again.

West unnerved as erratic Yeltsin beats the Slavic drum

WHEN Madeleine Albright meets Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, tomorrow, the US Secretary of State will first want to know whether President Yeltsin's warnings of a wider war presage a return to East-West confrontation. Or are they merely the symptoms of a power struggle in Moscow?

The questions will be urgently discussed today at Nato foreign ministers' meetings. Mr Yeltsin's warning of a third world war was swiftly played down by Kremlin officials. But it has underlined the sensitivity in Moscow at being marginalised in the Balkan conflict. Threat of a return to the Cold War would swiftly turn Western opinion against the Nato war.

The escalating rhetoric by

Nato's soothing words have little impact on the Kremlin, Michael Binyon writes

Duma and Kremlin officials provoked a flurry of telephone calls over the weekend, with Robin Cook, the Foreign Secretary, and other leaders attempting to assess Russia's mood and reassure Moscow that Nato airstrikes do not threaten Russian security.

Mr Ivanov told Mr Cook that Moscow did not intend to be drawn into the Yugoslav conflict. He gave similar promises to Kofi

Annan, the United Nations Secretary-General, and Massimo D'Alema, the Italian Prime Minister. They, in turn, insisted that Russia will be included in the search for a solution. Officials from the Group of Eight industrial nations met in Dresden to discuss a possible foreign ministers' meeting on Kosovo — the first full conference between senior Russian and Western officials since bombing began. Gregori Mamedov, the Russian Deputy Foreign Minister, emerged saying it had been easier to find a common language within G8 than within a Nato context.

But for all the reassurance given to Moscow, the war has become linked to the Kremlin power struggle. The West's difficulty is to know how much weight to place on Mr Yeltsin's erratic statements. Privately, diplomats say he is concerned with stopping his powers ebbing away to Yevgeny Primakov, the Russian Prime Minister, and feels obliged to bang the drum of Slav solidarity. But publicly the West cannot dismiss his warnings, nor shrug them off as politics. That would exacerbate the anti-Nato mood.

BALKANS WAR: THE REFUGEES

'Lost children' wall reunites families

Stephen Farrell
in Brazde finds a tragic symbol of the Kosovo
diaspora

It is the first thing you see as you enter Brazde refugee camp. A nondescript, peeling whitewashed wall before which scores of Kosovans remain to press themselves in supplication at all hours of the day.

It is the "Lost Children" wall. No one knows how many people have been separated from their families in the mass movement of refugees across the borders into Albania and Macedonia, only that every row of tents in every temporary camp throws up countless examples of a missing child, wife or husband. Their relatives leave to others the fears surrounding the expected handover by Nato of the camps to the Macedonian authorities, whose police have been accused of beating and abusing the people they are soon to protect.

For those milling around the wall all that matters is finding their loved ones. Elderly women stand on tiptoe to read the curling, scrawled notices pinned on the 50ft by 8ft wall high above their reach. Fathers scan notices typed on the backs of United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees' stationery and printed on scraps of cardboard boxes.

One former Republic of Yugoslavia passport is there, bearing the details of 45-year-old Mrs Kadriu Salih from Lipjan. Another photocopied sheet bears, in colour, pictures of Egzona Kasabagi — aged four, "brown hair, brown eyes" — and her father Nexhat, 45, from Pristina.

Entrusted with the task of finding which other camps and countries have taken the people, herded on to different trains and buses, is the International Committee of the Red Cross, and its registration scheme. New arrivals drop their messages in a cardboard box marked "Messages" pinned to the centre of the wall, and next to it is the ICRC's Lost Children list giving details of family name, father's name, child's name, age, town and camp.

The 'Lost Children' wall at Brazde camp in Macedonia draws refugees in search of information of missing families. A poster, below, of Jehona Aliu seeks news of her parents

Top of the list is five-year-old Jehona Aliu, the five-year-old girl from Ferizaj, whose plight was reported by The Times last Friday. She became separated from her mother, brothers and sisters when she went to the toilet at the Blace border crossing two weeks ago. Jehona is still the only long-standing occupant of the Lost Children tent run by Captain Bill Soper of the Royal Engineers. She still sits, combing a doll's hair, inside the tent where she comforts other children who arrive, stay until their tearful mothers are found among the 20,000 plus camp population and depart, leaving her behind.

The British Army has now issued a poster of Jehona to be circulated around Macedonia, Albania and anywhere they hope to find her father, Sherif, and mother, Sadje. The black and white posters bear the message: "Jehona Aliu, aged five. She was found at Blace and is from Ferizaj. We are looking for her mother Sadje and father Sherif. Anyone who knows Jehona or her parents please contact Captain Bill Soper (English) at the Brazde refugee camp, telephone 070 226 370."

Captain Soper, 48, of 28 Engineer Regiment, is now desperate to find them because many of his local refugee helpers are moving on, having themselves found places to go. "I am getting anxious. We have had no sightings whatsoever," he said last night. "We think her parents went straight off to Albania. She had a crying session last night because she had a bad dream that she had lost her sister, but we are still hoping." Other missing children come from the Brazde, Bojane, Stankovic and Noprostino camps, but older ones are also being sought. Mejdai Malic, 52, yesterday posted details of his children Bejnik, 20, and Edita, 24. "They are somewhere in Tetovo but I do not know where. We were separated a week ago, two days after we left Pristina. I hope I can find them, I do not know if this will work, but there is nothing else I can try," he said.

Beside the ICRC "Lost Children" list is the Missing Families section, where any journalist or aid worker with a mobile telephone is liable to be asked if it can be borrowed to inform friends and families of people's whereabouts. Outside the gates of Brazde, Macedonian guards continue to patrol the fences as buses arrive and depart bringing refugees to and from other sites. Nato will not say when it is due to hand over the running of camps but it is expected within the next few days. The Royal Engineers took the lead in setting up drainage, water supplies and food distribution in the rush to set up the camps after the discovery of the squalid conditions in which 65,000 refugees were kept at the Blace border crossing nearby, but the number of British forces at Brazde has dropped from 250 at its peak to around 80, out of a total of 300

Nato personnel. The Macedonians have promised not to blockade refugees in camps after worldwide protests over the conditions at Blace and the forcible late night movement of 30,000 people from the camp without the knowledge of aid agencies.

On the Greek side of the argument, Albanian crime is a big problem. Popular feeling in Greece over the war is overwhelmingly pro-Yugoslav, and a football match last week between Partizan of Belgrade and a Greek team turned into a wild anti-Nato political demonstration. The continuation of bombing over Orthodox Easter has brought popular feeling to a head.

Greek threats spark exodus

FROM JAMES PETTIFER
IN KAKAVIA

HIGH up here in the Buret mountains on the Greek-Albanian border, hundreds of Albanian workers are fleeing Greece with their families after death threats from Orthodox extremists.

Usually people leave Albania to go to Greece but the war has reversed the flight. A queue of cars miles long stretches down the hillside. Many come from northern Greek towns with strong nationalist and Orthodox traditions.

Miranda and Ilir Gjika stand by the family Fiat, loaded with all their belongings after three years' work in the town of Arta. "We had our flat windows broken. Then our boy here was hit in the street. Last week they painted 'Orthodox or Death' and a Cross on the flat door," they said.

The Greek nationalist Right has a strong clerical flavour, ranging from the lunatic fringe that wants to take 666 off the telephone directory because it is the devil's number, to young skinheads who have adapted Orthodox vocabulary, however much the church rejects them.

Further down the line of cars was Arben, an engineer who had been studying in Salonika. With the city's large Serb diaspora population, he felt a particular target. "They threw me out of the university dormitory. And the police blame Albanians for everything."

On the Greek side of the argument, Albanian crime is a big problem. Popular feeling in Greece over the war is overwhelmingly pro-Yugoslav, and a football match last week between Partizan of Belgrade and a Greek team turned into a wild anti-Nato political demonstration. The continuation of bombing over Orthodox Easter has brought popular feeling to a head.

Sophie may not vow to 'obey' Prince Edward

REPORTS that Sophie Rhys-Jones will promise to obey Prince Edward when they marry on June 19 are distinctly premature, Buckingham Palace said yesterday.

Officials claimed yesterday that details of the wedding had still to be finalised, and that they would be released "in due course". The Prince played his courtship close to his chest, and even managed to keep his engagement secret until he was ready to announce it in his own time.

But speculation, inevitably, is already rife on the details of the ceremony, which is to be conducted in St George's Chapel, Windsor, by the Bishop of Norwich, in front of 500 invited guests and with 2,000 members of the public admitted to the castle courtyard outside to watch the arrivals and departures.

The ceremony is expected to be along traditional lines, but the bride's promise to obey her husband is heard less and less in these days of presumed sexual equality.

Diana, Princess of Wales, declined to obey at her marriage ceremony in St Paul's Cathedral in 1981, as did Elton

Royal couple

Jenkins when she married William Hague in the Commons crypt in 1997.

The Prince and Miss Rhys-Jones will start marriage on an equal footing in as much as both run their own businesses — he a television production company and she a public relations consultancy. But both are thought to be in favour of tradition, as is the bishop who will marry them.

Most marriages in the Church of England are conducted according to the 1980 Alternative Service Book, which allows a choice. Couples may "love, cherish and obey" or, rather, simply "love and cherish."

But Church leaders have been surprised at reaction to their new Millennium Prayer Book, designed for use in the next century and quietly launched last summer for test-marketing in 400 parishes. Initial versions completely omitted the word "obey" because the liturgical committee which drew up the book believed it to be old-fashioned and that no modern woman would want it.

Parishes, however, were quick to insist that a woman should at least have the choice, and "obey" was quietly slotted back in.

The Millennium Prayer Book also proposes that it be optional for a bride to walk up the aisle with her father, because it gives the impression that a woman is the property of a man. Instead, in a feminist twist, a couple can arrive at the church together and walk up the aisle together.

It is highly unlikely that the Prince and Miss Rhys-Jones will choose that option; the bride is almost certain to be accompanied up the aisle by her father, Christopher.

Instead of having a single best man, however, the Prince is believed to be considering having both his brothers, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York, as "supporters" for the ceremony.

The Prince is expected to use the marriage service from the 1928 Book of Common Prayer, which follows closely Thomas Cranmer's ringing and poetic text from the 1662 Anglican prayer book. The 1980 Alternative Service Book is regarded by many as having killed off the poetry.

MP tries to derail the Royal Train

BY ALAN HAMILTON

A LABOUR MP will try to shunt the Royal Train into the scrapyard this week, despite strenuous attempts by Buckingham Palace to cut its running costs.

Alan Williams, a member of the Commons Public Accounts Committee, said yesterday he would ask Sir John Bourn, Comptroller and Auditor-General and the Government's financial watchdog, to review the Palace's £17 million annual travel budget.

The MP for Swansea West admitted that his principal target was the train, which during the past financial year was used only 19 times but still cost £1.1 million. Its most notorious journey was to take the Queen from Victoria station to the 1997 Derby, a 20-mile run that cost £11,800.

If Sir John agrees to a review, he will order the National Audit Office to examine funding of all royal travel, including the train and the RAF Royal Squadron. The report could go before the Public Accounts Committee for scrutiny by MPs.

Two years ago, in a re-organisation of royal finances, the Palace assumed direct control of the travel budget. Last year Sir Michael Peat, Keeper of the Privy Purse and the Queen's senior financial adviser, announced savings of £2 million on the royal travel budget.

Costs of running the Royal Train were cut in the first year from a budgeted £1.8 million to £1.1 million. Sir Michael said at the time that the cost for the current financial year should be less than £1 million.

Recently the Palace announced that it would further cut costs by leasing the train to ministers for official duties but there have been no takers. The train has been cut from 14 coaches to eight and its two locomotives now work on normal duties when not required for royal travel.

Mr Williams said: "I want the whole system looked at, to see if we are getting value for money under the new arrangements. I spent years chasing the waste on the Royal Yacht. The train is very similar — both are royal toys."

"It is hard to see why government departments would want to use the train at all, as ministers have been happily travelling about their business on ordinary trains for years."

Pupils' exam blunders are no joke for school chiefs

Education department is less than amused by shocking ignorance, reports Diana Blamires

A MYTH is a female moth and Joan of Arc was burnt to a steak, according to GCSE candidates who have come top of the class in misunderstanding and inspired guesswork.

A list of the top 20 clangers in recent examination answers has been compiled by examiners throughout Britain.

Howlers may bring light relief to examiners but the Department of Education and Employment was yesterday not amused by the shocking ignorance displayed by some candidates.

A spokeswoman said: "The Government views improving literacy as very important. It has introduced a new literacy strategy to help pupils improve their reading, writing and spelling. Primary school children now have to spend an hour reading every day as part of the strategy."

"We are trying to ensure that children have the basic skills once they reach secondary schools so that hopefully these kind of mistakes will be made less often in the future," she said.

"The Government is aware of claims that GCSE standards are slipping. The Qualifications and Curriculum Agency carried out research to see whether GCSE standards had fallen over the years and concluded that they are being maintained."

"The Government has set up an independent panel to

Raleigh: did not invent cigarettes and smoking

Socrates: did not die from an overdose of wedlock

Drake: did not circumcise the world with a clipper

monitor GCSE and A level standards."

Nick Seaton, chairman of the Campaign for Real Education, which is pressing for higher standards in state schools, said: "These howlers suggest that there are serious deficiencies in pupils' learning of the basics. They are making a lot of spelling mistakes and misusing commonly used words."

"There is a considerable amount of research showing that GCSE standards have got worse. If you look at grade A GCSE exam papers now compared with those ten years ago there are more spelling mistakes in the later papers. It is something that should be addressed as a matter of urgency. These mistakes are occurring too frequently for it to be by chance."

Theresa May, the Conservative education spokesman, added: "It is a concern when we see people who have come through the system making these howlers."

"The Government needs to make sure that everyone learns the basics. It is very important to make sure that standards don't fall."

"There are also fears that boys are not doing as well as girls at GCSE because there is more coursework involved," she added. "Boys often tend to leave all the work until the end and do last-minute revision for exams."

The examiners who marked recent history, music, religion and classical studies GCSE examination papers found that some pupils would have benefited from more revision.

History has been rewritten for some of our nation's greatest heroes. According to one pupil: "Sir Walter Raleigh is a historical figure — he invented cigarettes and started smoking."

Another candidate wrote: "Sir Francis Drake circumcised the world with a 100ft clipper."

The further back into history that pupils delved, the more their memories failed them. "Ancient Egypt was inhabited by mummies and they wrote in hydraulics," wrote one confused candidate. "Julius Caesar extinguished himself on the battlefields of Gaul," wrote another.

Pupils who had no answers resorted to hypothesising. "Beethoven wrote music even though he was deaf — he was so deaf he wrote loud music," claimed one candidate, while another suggested: "The sun never set on the British Empire because the British Empire is in the East and the sun sets in the West."

The Classics also produced some classics. "In the Olympic Games, Greeks ran races, jumped, hurled the biscuits and threw the javas," according to one candidate. "Socrates died from an overdose of wedlock — after his death his career suffered a dramatic decline," was also not the right answer.

Some pupils chose to invent their own religion when Biblical questions proved too taxing. "Moses went up on Mount Cyanide to get the ten commandments," one mistaken pupil answered. A new theory of Creation was offered by another candidate who declared: "Adam and Eve were created from an apple tree."

Contrary to the belief of one GCSE pupil, Joan of Arc was not burnt to a steak

Ex-wife steps up pressure on Woodhead to resign

By HANNAH BETTS

PRESSURE was increasing on the Chief Inspector of Schools, Chris Woodhead, yesterday as the Government announced it was examining documents sent by his ex-wife that she claims prove he lied about an affair with a former pupil.

Cathy Woodhead joined calls for an inquiry into the episode, adding that she may sue her former husband if the Government refuses to take action. Department for Education and Employment officials said they had received information and documents from her. But they would not reveal the nature of the information, nor whether it could threaten Mr Woodhead's career.

David Blinkett, the Education and Employment Secretary, said yesterday that, so far, he had been made aware of no evidence that would affect Mr Woodhead's position. "Angry and distraught recollections or notes made by a solicitor in the autumn of 1976 do not constitute a case for action or anything that could threaten Chris Woodhead's job," he added.

Mr Woodhead said: "I have no comment to make on what my former wife wants to do. She must make up her own mind to do what she wants to do for herself."

Cathy Woodhead accuses her ex-husband of trying to conceal the fact that his affair with Amanda Johnston began while he was a teacher and she a pupil at the Gordano School in Bristol in the mid-Seventies — an allegation that Mr Woodhead and Ms Johnston have denied.

Mrs Woodhead also claims that her ex-husband tried to persuade her to collude in the denial, to protect his £115,000-a-year job. She has argued that solicitors' notes from their divorce proceedings make it clear that the affair pre-dated Ms Johnston leaving school.

Within the last month, former Gordano School teachers have supported her allegations. The Labour MP Alice Mahon tabled a Commons motion calling on Mr Woodhead to resign — a call backed by several delegates to the National Union of Teachers' Easter conference. Other unions have argued in favour of a government inquiry.

Bishop pleads for solution to arms deadlock

SINN FEIN and the Ulster Unionists will go to Stormont tomorrow to try to salvage the Northern Ireland peace process from collapse. The two sides are as polarised as ever over the decommissioning of IRA arms.

Sean Brady, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, pleaded yesterday with both sides to find a solution and avoid a return to the "mayhem, murder and misery" that has dominated life in the Province for more than 30 years.

The chances of a solution, however, are slim. Sinn Fein refuses to recognise the Hillsborough Declaration, drawn up by the British and Irish Governments before Easter in an attempt to break the deadlock. The republicans describe it as "unacceptable".

The declaration proposes that the political parties in Northern Ireland nominate an executive and, within a month,

Blair and Ahern on standby in hope of Ulster breakthrough, reports Audrey Magee hold a day of reconciliation when terrorists will prove that their weapons are "beyond use". Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern, said decommissioning was not a precondition to entry to the executive, but "an obligation".

One republican source, a former IRA prisoner, described the declaration as "a waste of paper": no amount of semantics would make the IRA hand over their arms, particularly when loyalist violence was on the increase.

The republican movement's continued defiance leaves the two Governments in a difficult position. David Trimble, leader of the Ulster Unionists, wants tangible proof of IRA disarmament before his party sits on the executive with Sinn Fein. He also needs it to win back the half of his assembly party opposed to the peace process.

One Unionist source said: "There is no room for manoeuvre. The UUP leadership has gone as far as it can go. We are looking to the republicans for movement. And it has to be real movement. Showing a sealed bunker as supposed proof of 'beyond use' is not enough."

Decommissioning has been an issue in the peace process since the start, but the two Governments have repeatedly skirted around it, hoping that a way out would emerge as the peace process rolled on. While Unionists continued to insist on the handover of IRA weapons, despite Sinn Fein's insistence that it could not deliver, Sinn Fein hoped the matter would be dropped.

Republicans view any handover of weapons as a surrender. If a way is to be found round the deadlock, the two Governments must come up with a way of satisfying the Unionists without securing an IRA surrender. Such a move could result in a split in Sinn Fein and major defections to the republican dissidents.

To date, a successful formula has been elusive. However, the Governments remain optimistic that one will be found and are encouraged by both sides' willingness to try to find a political solution. "Sinn Fein hasn't thrown the whole process out of the window and said they're not coming back, so there is hope yet," one Dublin source said.

The talks will be led tomorrow by Mo Mowlam, the Northern Ireland Secretary, and David Andrews, the Irish Foreign Minister. Mr Blair and Mr Ahern are on standby if there are signs of movement.

If you can't choose between a fixed rate and a variable rate, why not have both?

Preferential Rate

Fixed Rate

100% Mortgage

Personal Choice™ is already one of the most flexible mortgages around. But now it's even more flexible with an option to fix part of the loan until the end of April 2002 at just 5.99%, while paying the rest at the variable rate, currently 6.94% (typical APR 7.1% variable). Subject to a minimum amount of £30,000 at each rate. This means you can benefit from having a fixed rate on some of your loan. But you still have the flexibility to pay more each month when you can and less when you can't. You can even take payment holidays of up to six months*. Particularly useful if you are self-employed with a fluctuating income. You can pay in lump sums without penalty to reduce the amount of borrowing you have at the variable rate. A redemption charge to the fixed rate borrowing will apply during the fixed rate period. If you are transferring your mortgage, you can take advantage of our free remortgage package. You can even raise additional capital*. Call our helpline on 0800 810 810, any time between 8am to 10pm, and we'll be delighted to help you.

Darts research scores bull's eye

By Nigel Hawkes
SCIENCE EDITOR

AMATEUR darts players do themselves no favours by trying to copy the champions seen on television. David Percy, a mathematician at Salford University, has proved that for poor players, aiming at the treble 20 is not the best strategy. Rank amateurs do better to risk derision and aim at the bull's eye, he says. Slightly better players should go for the treble 14.

Dr Percy has applied Bayesian decision theory to the game, using data provided by three Salford students. The method is a way of drawing sound conclusions from limited data.

He asked the students to aim 50 darts at a cross on a sheet of graph paper. From this he could work out the scatter in each student's throwing.

He used the data to simulate the results of throwing 10,000 darts, and calculated an average score per dart for different target points on the board.

Top players aim at the treble 20 because it is worth 60, ten more than the bull's eye. But the 20 sector is flanked by one and five, and be calculated that poor players are liable to end up scoring a paltry 26.

Play to win: amateurs should forget treble 20

In Mathematics Today, Dr Percy concludes that the two worst players he tested would score more by going for the bull. The difference is not enormous — rather less than an average one point per dart thrown.

However, even for the third and most competent player, the best results would come from going for the bull rather than his next best option, treble 14.

LA takes cold comfort from El Niño's sister

FROM GILES WHITTALL IN LOS ANGELES

THE coldest spring in 100 years left the bewildered citizens of Los Angeles shivering at the weekend — if they were not skiing in the local mountains or gazing inland from the beach at scenes that might have been from Switzerland.

In what is officially the third week of spring, up to a foot and a half of snow blanketed the mountains that form the city's eastern edge, while temperatures on the fringes of Los Angeles County plunged lower than those in parts of Alaska. Late last week there were even reports of snow in suburbs as low as 1,000 feet above sea level.

A series of cold fronts generated in the Gulf of Alaska blew ashore last Wednesday, and failed to warm up over the weekend as predicted. The results included hail in Malibu and Hollywood, and temperatures of 18F atop Mount Wilson, a short drive from Pasadena. In Fairbanks, which is just south of the Arctic Circle, the corresponding temperature was 19F.

The freak conditions in and around one of the most climatically spoilt cities on earth have been blamed by some on a split jetstream carrying weather normally destined for Washington State further south than usual. Others blame the cold snap on La Niña, El Niño's chilly sister.

Both weather phenomena are driven by changing surface temperatures in the Pacific Ocean, but unlike the warm downpours dumped on Southern California last year by El Niño, La Niña has proved cold and relatively dry. Despite three winter storms since Easter, Los Angeles' total precipitation so far this year has been less than half last year's equivalent.

South of the city, the snow has brought tragedy. Last week, nine Mexicans died in blizzards in rugged mountains east of San Diego, where illegal immigrants increasingly cross the US border at night on foot because of clampdowns at official crossing points.

But in middle-class Los Angeles the effect of the freeze has been mainly sartorial.

Seldom-used sweaters have been pulled from bottom drawers and half-term family outings, complete with woolly hats and scarves, have resembled scenes from a New England winter.

From Santa Monica to Hermosa Beach, the groomed sands that by this time of year are usually welcoming their first plane loads of European sun worshippers were largely deserted over the weekend. Joggers ran in full tracksuits, surfers were few and far between, and the Los Angeles Times asked in a baffled reference to Alaska's famous dog-sled race: "What next for shivering LA? The Iditarod?"

Coastal communities north of San Francisco received their first snow since records began, while ski resorts in the Lake Tahoe region looked forward to a long season thanks to up to two feet of fresh powder snow in the past few days.

Mammoth Mountain, the closest major ski resort to Los Angeles, now has a 12 to 14-ft base.

There was some relief from the cold in Palm Springs — but not much. Yesterday's temperature of 75F was tepid for this time of year.

The forecasters, meanwhile, predict that things will warm up this week. But we've heard that sort of thing before.

Dismay as India starts missile tests

BY MICHAEL BINYON AND ZAHID HUSSAIN IN KARACHI

George Fernandes at the announcement yesterday

INDIA yesterday test-fired its Agni II ballistic missile, breaking a five-year period of restraint and drawing global expressions of concern.

Britain and the United States voiced worry and regret, giving a warning that the test of the intermediate-range missile would provoke Pakistan into a similar military response.

Sartaj Aziz, the Pakistani Foreign Minister, swiftly confirmed their fears, saying his country would give a "befitting response". He said: "We had decided on restraint. But now Pakistan will have to examine its options how to respond to the Indian tests."

He gave a warning that the missile test could propel the South Asian region into a full-blown arms race. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said Pakistan was obliged to maintain a deterrent to guarantee peace and stability in the region, and officials expect a Pakistani test of its medium-range Ghauri missile soon.

The Indian test came 11 months after its controversial nuclear test. The Government called it an "historic feat" and Atal Behari Vajpayee, the Prime Minister, congratulated the scientists responsible for this "great achievement".

It was said to be a perfect textbook launch, made from the eastern coastal state of Orissa. The missile is officially said to have a range of 1,250 miles, but defence experts say it can reach over 1,500 miles, putting all of Pakistan within its range. George Fernandes, the Indian Defence Minister, said the test had made the Agni II an operational weapons system and no one could dare threaten India now.

The Foreign Office expressed regret at the test. "We continue to believe that restraint in developing missiles and nuclear weapons is in India's long-term interest," a spokesman said. America also urged India to show restraint in keeping with its declared intention of avoiding a nuclear race with its neighbours.

Mr Fernandes was defiant, however. "This concerns our national security. No one can put pressure on us. We don't need to be told by anybody about restraint."

China, which also comes within range of the Agni II, made no immediate comment on the test.

India said that it had given Pakistan a day's advance warning of the missile test. In keeping with a declaration signed by Mr Vajpayee during his visit to Lahore in February, But Pakistan complained that it was informed only in response to an inquiry by its High Commissioner in Delhi.

Gopalaswami Parthasarathy, India's High Commissioner to Pakistan, said India's missile tests were not a threat to any country. "We have pledged our first use of these weapons — and India is committed to its talks with Pakistan," he said.

Pakistan last year tested the Ghauri, with a range of more than 930 miles. And during a military parade last month it also displayed its untested Shaheen missile. Pakistan conducted a series of nuclear tests in response to the Indian explosions last May, but since then both countries have declared a unilateral moratorium. Most defence experts believe that they may conduct more nuclear tests before signing the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty sometime this year.

Zhu Rongji, the Chinese Prime Minister, shows off the cowboy hat he was given at a state dinner in Denver

Beijing cowboy hits the trail

FROM IAN BRODIE IN WASHINGTON

SMILING broadly, Zhu Rongji, Prime Minister of China, dutifully donned a cowboy hat and listened to cowboy music when he reached the Rockies on his American tour.

In Denver, he was serenaded by the Bar D Wranglers with such tunes as Tumbling Tumbleweeds and Cool Water. Then he moved on for a glimpse of another aspect of American popular culture, with a visit to the training gym of the Denver Broncos, the Super Bowl champions of the National Football League. Once more playing the "media savvy" good sport, Mr Zhu tossed a football around for the cameras.

He showed a shaft of sly humour during a technology company tour, inquiring if the white laboratory coat he was given to wear had been made in China. Yes, he was told.

Demonstrators continued to dog Mr Zhu in Colorado, home to a large Tibetan community. Twenty-three people carrying signs that read "China out of Tibet" were detained briefly on a street that had been cleared for security.

Although Mr Zhu's tourist schedule was busy — later yesterday he moved on to Chicago — the mood was less intense than during earlier talks in Washington, where he failed to reach agreement with President Clinton on Chinese entry into the World Trade Organisation. Mr Zhu was not sure Mr Clinton's assessment of Congressional reluctance to admit China was accurate.

He claimed that one unidentified senator had whispered in his ear: "Just wait for about two months. I guarantee we will ratify that agreement."

WORLD IN BRIEF

First American 'from Polynesia'

Los Angeles: Thigh bones found on an island off California could be from North America's oldest skeleton, according to scientists whose findings challenge American Indians' most cherished beliefs about the continent's population (Giles Whittall writes). The bones, stored since being found in 1959, are now said to be from a woman who died about 13,000 years ago — 1,400 years earlier than first thought. The difference is crucial, suggesting the New World's first human beings may have come not by foot from Siberia, but by boat, possibly from Polynesia.

"She may be the earliest inhabitant we have discovered," John Johnson of Santa Barbara Museum said after a paper was presented on Arlington Springs Woman, outlining retesting using the latest DNA and radiocarbon dating methods. If the date is correct, she would have lived when the mainland was roamed by woolly mammoths and largely covered by glaciers.

Timor's bishop attacked

Jakarta: Bishop Carlos Belo, the East Timorese spiritual leader and Nobel laureate, escaped injury when the convoy he was travelling in was attacked by a pro-Indonesian militia group (Patricia Numan writes). The bishop was returning to the East Timorese capital of Dili after celebrating Mass at the site of a massacre that happened on Tuesday in Liquisa, 18 miles west of here, when about 30 militia members threw stones and steel pipes at the convoy.

Israeli troops pull out

Jerusalem: Moshe Arens, the Defence Minister, announced amid growing public pressure that Israel will reduce its military presence in southern Lebanon (Ross Dunn writes). He said that 80 per cent of Israeli army posts in southern Lebanon have been transferred to allies in the unofficial South Lebanon Army and more would be handed over this month. That would enable more Israeli troops to leave the self-declared security zone, established in 1985 to prevent cross-border attacks.

Child-killing charge

Vienna: Austria's Ministry of Justice has indicted Dr Heinrich Gross, 84, as an accessory to the murder of five children deemed to be handicapped under Hitler's euthanasia programme (Nigel Glass writes). His lawyer, Nikolaus Lehner, said that he was considering an appeal. The failure to charge Dr Gross, who headed the former Vienna Am Spiegelgrund mental hospital where 700 children were murdered, had scandalised those Austrians who say the country is unwilling to face its Nazi past.

German spared stoning in Iran

FROM ROGER BOYES IN BONN

A GERMAN engineer sentenced death by stoning has been released on bail after Bonn intervened with Iran.

Helmut Hofer, 57, of Hamburg, was arrested by the Iranian authorities in 1997 after being accused of having sexual intercourse with an Iranian medical student. He was given the toughest possible sentence for adultery — stoning — and relations between Iran and Germany plunged.

Hofer will be released on bail of £100,000, but he is obliged to stay in Iran until the sentence is formally quashed. The woman involved was sentenced to 90 lashes.

Bobo Hornbach, adviser to Gerhard Schröder, the German Chancellor, who has been conducting the negotiations with Iran, made plain in Tehran at the weekend that Hofer's release would help to end Iran's isolation: President Khatami accepted an invitation to visit Germany.

The stoning case took on several bizarre twists. Hofer denied that he did more than kiss the student. The 28-year-old woman was obliged to undergo medical tests to establish her virginity. Three gynaecologists found she was a virgin; a fourth doctor — the one believed by the clerical court — said she was not.

The Hofer investigation coincided with the trial in Germany of a group of assassins in the pay of the Iranian secret service. Their sentencing led to a European diplomatic boycott of Iran.

War and speech

In the battle of words political leaders rely upon winning phrases — and behind many great speeches there is an army of wordsmiths. James Landale, below, and Damian Whitworth report

The crisis in Kosovo, the search for peace in Northern Ireland, and the election campaign in Scotland and Wales have over the past three weeks tested Tony Blair's stamina to the limit. But the endless round of interviews, Commons statements and speeches have also proved a challenge for the Prime Minister's staff, particularly his speechwriters.

Blair might be desperate for just fifteen minutes when he manages his next break, probably a visit to Tuscany in August, a vital file will accompany him. Despite being on holiday he will pick up that file, and scribble for several minutes. Then he will reread his text, write some more and put his pen down with satisfaction.

Blair will already be looking forward to Blackpool in October and he will have just written the preface to his conference speech.

Margaret Thatcher had her speeches written by the late Sir Ronald Millar, the man who told us that the lady was not for turning. President Clinton has a bunch of bright young things who churn out speeches. But Blair does more than deliver his speeches; he likes to write them as well. Even with run-of-the-mill speeches, which have largely been drafted by his staff, Blair will almost always rewrite chunks if he has the time. Not only does this make it easier for him to deliver, it also gives him complete control over the words.

The genesis of any Blair speech is almost always a bundle of handwritten notes. For all his excitement about the Internet, he is still a computer-phobe who prefers to write in longhand. The notes set out the structure of the speech, with broad themes and key phrases. Alastair Campbell, Blair's official spokesman, then gets involved. Campbell is a key player in the drafting process, often coming up with the phrase which articulates the theme and ultimately shapes the headline. He takes the notes and throws them at the Downing Street policy unit to put some flesh on the bones.

For a major conference speech, each of the policy units will draft sections covering their areas of expertise. In more regular and policy-specific speeches, they might write much of the initial draft. The policy unit is a mixture of write. Often the two skills do not go hand in hand.

Outsiders from academia, industry and the voluntary sector might be asked to provide a perspective. If the speech is non-partisan, some Civil Service input might be sought. A strength is that the speechwriters are also the policymakers, and a different mix of people can be used for each speech. This provides a flexibility and a proximity to day-to-day politics that a separate speechwriting unit would lack.

The man who has the difficult job of putting the various bits together is Peter Hyman, 30, the policy unit's strategic adviser. Hyman, who trained as a journalist, will start knocking a text into shape, often with the help of Campbell.

The two former journalists who head Downing Street's strategic communications unit might get involved at this point. Philip Bassett, the former industrial editor of The Times, and David Bradshaw, the former lobby correspondent of The Mirror, spend much of their time drafting newspaper articles for Blair, but they also get involved in speechwriting.

A workable text will then be scrutinised and reworked by David Miliband, 34, the head of the policy unit. He ensures that the policy is not oversold and does not promise the undeliverable. Nothing is more dangerous to a political leader than an overambitious speech.

Jonathan Powell, the Prime Minister's Chief of Staff, does not play a significant role in the speechwriting process, even though it was he who dreamt up Blair's pre-election mantra of "education, education, education".

With a text broadly in shape, Blair and Campbell will tear it apart again before putting it back together in the run-up to the party conference.

Brainstorming sessions will be held to come up with a few jokes. But as one Downing Street source says, "policy words are not that good at jokes", so comical remarks are occasionally asked to suggest some gags. Roy Hudd, of BBC Radio's The News Huddlines, once contributed some, but his jokes were often so badly that Blair often denied writing jokes for Blair. Certainly, a faxed request from Jonathan Powell in 1996 for jokes was rejected. But Downing Street insiders claim the fax was sent only because Bremner had given jokes before.

Blair does not deliver one-liners with ease, and often a joke is cut. What he wants in a speech is an argument. If there is no clear logic, he is prepared to rip up a speech that has been worked on for weeks and rewrite it completely. "Basically, Tony leads," says one source. "He will have a strong sense of what he wants to say, what the issues are and what the speech must achieve."

There is a long process, but the speech is what Tony wants. But most of these words are soon forgotten. Who remembers Blair's promise to make Britain a "beacon to the world" in September 1997? Or "the Giving Age" and "the Young Country"? Whatever happened to the "Stakeholder Society"? What, indeed.

There have always been presidential speechwriters. Even George Washington had Alexander Hamilton to scratch stuff out for him. But speechmaking became crucial only after Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson established the White House as the "bully pulpit", from which they wrested more power through regular addresses to the nation and Congress, articulating their agendas.

In the second half of the century aides started to write more and more of their boss's speeches. Confronted with the television age, Richard Nixon was the first President to hire a special cohort of scribes. Today, in the Old Executive Office Building across the

His master's voice: leading White House speechwriter Michael Waldman, left, says that he writes as if he were inside President Clinton's head

President Clinton shuffled his notes, looked into the camera and began reading from the Autocue. "My fellow Americans," he began, and for 13 minutes he explained how attacking Serbia was "advancing the cause of peace". It may not have had quite the effect of Franklin Roosevelt's wartime call for the US to be the "arsenal of democracy", to which 76 per cent of Americans tuned their radios. And it is hardly likely to go down in history alongside Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, a speech that Clinton can recite by heart, but these were his words to his people at a time of national importance.

Or were they his words? He certainly spoke them. But did he think of them? Of all Presidents this century, Clinton is one of the most gifted speakers, able to talk fluently off the cuff for an hour, or engage in a spirited debate on the meaning of the word "is".

Once, when the wrong text was fed into the Teleprompter, he winged the first seven minutes of an address to Congress without anyone noticing. But he has to deliver up to 600 speeches a year, from greetings to Scout groups in the Rose Garden to pronouncements on welfare reform. And with cameras recording every one, this most telegenic of politicians is not going to be caught for words. So he has others to help him to come up with a few hundred thousand of them.

There have always been presidential speechwriters. Even George Washington had Alexander Hamilton to scratch stuff out for him. But speechmaking became crucial only after Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson established the White House as the "bully pulpit", from which they wrested more power through regular addresses to the nation and Congress, articulating their agendas.

In the second half of the century aides started to write more and more of their boss's speeches. Confronted with the television age, Richard Nixon was the first President to hire a special cohort of scribes.

Today, in the Old Executive Office Building across the street from the White House, a team of speechwriters slaves away in what amounts to a word factory. They are clever young things who must be equally proficient turning Treasury gobbledegook into intelligible soundbites or polishing a joke so that the President doesn't fall flat on his face at a gala dinner.

"It's enjoyable but it's tiring. It's not a lifetime's job. It's a young person's sport; you burn out," says Michael Waldman, the 38-year-old chief speechwriter. He has been at Clinton's side since 1992 as an adviser and writer and is expected to leave the White House imminently to tend the tendrilous in his wrists caused by constant battering at a word processor — and to get a life after four years full-time on the speechwriting beat.

His team of six includes June Shih, 26, a Harvard graduate who was poached from Hillary Clinton's office, and Jeffrey Shesol, 29, who was hired after the President read a book that he had written about the presidency.

Waldman says he sees little of himself in a recently published novel about a chief speechwriter whose girlfriend, a White House aide, has an affair with the President. Face Time, written by Erik Tarloff, who is married to a former White House aide and had himself written jokes for Clinton, depicted speechwriters as fated figures on the Washington social scene. This is denied by the present bunch. "I don't get invited to all those parties," says Waldman. But he does have more "face time" with the President than many previous speechwriters. In the Reagan and Bush White Houses, the writers were seen as separate from those making policy. But because Waldman came to speechwriting from policy work, he has regular access to Clinton. This is vital, he says, not just for understanding what needs to be articulated, but also for knowing how it needs to be said.

"It has to capture his voice and his views and way of looking at things. It has to have the cadences and the mental processes of the person you are writing for." To capture their master's voice, Waldman and his gang will bang on Clinton's every word and often incorporate phrases that he uses in conversation into their texts. "If it's too ornate, he tends to cross out the rhetoric and just wants to tell the story," says Waldman. Often what he has been given by his scribes is treated as a signature tune around which he improvises. "He's a jazz improviser who riffs all over the place," says Jeremy Rosner, an early Clinton speechwriter.

Although he has produced few phrases that will live beyond his presidency, most agree with Waldman that Clinton is "still the best speechwriter in the White House".

Pity the poor millionaire

You can't move for millionaires these days. Having a seven-figure bank balance is no longer the preserve of the upper classes who inherit and super-wealthy supermarket dynasties. You are just as likely to bump into rude pop stars, unshaven authors, dim footballers, brash media folk and scruffy Internet nerds as you sip Bollinger, sup on Betuga and stop off in Biarritz.

But why has being a millionaire lost its kudos? The magic six noughts no longer mean you are officially rich, since the entry fee to the Sunday Times Rich List of the 1,000 wealthiest people in Britain is a cool £21 million. (The Spice Girls, worth £15 million apiece, don't make it.) Another sobering thought is that the fortune of Bill Gates, the richest man on the planet, has brought a paper windfall for those with houses in desirable postcodes. It is almost impossible to bag a large family home in Central London for under a million, which makes for lots of rich homeowners.

There are about 760 lottery winners, whose shrewdest financial move was to invest a pound in remembering the birthdays of their granny/wife/son/boss/dog. And what do they do with their money? If you're Karl Crompton, who scooped £11 million in 1996, you waste your days racing around in Ferraris and Ducatis, overtaken by worries about how to keep it. There is the tax to get stressed about. And new friendships are tarnished with suspicion.

Perhaps the most uncool thing about making a million is that it leaves you stranded in that social no-man's land between the haves and the have-nots. It's too much money to ignore but not enough to propel you into the premier league: too much money to stay in a suburban semi, but not enough for a Mayfair penthouse.

"There is a saying that to be really rich, you should not just be able to live off the interest, but live off the interest of your interest," says Dr Dorothy Rowe, author of The Real Meaning of Money (HarperCollins, £7.99). "And, due to inflation, a million is not what it used to be [£1 million in the 1950s is equivalent to £14 million to-

How to be an urban peasant

Simple shapes in linen, cheesecloth and rosebud prints give a rustic look that you can wear in the city, says Fashion Editor Lisa Armstrong

Ruffled, sprigged and laced into the kind of perfectly buffed walking boots that Tess of the d'Urbervilles might have opted for — had she been contemplating popping into Knightsbridge for a spot of lunch in Daphne's — the personifications of the new rural idyll tramped down the catwalk by the score.

The tousled, windblown

hair that would have been the norm 100 years ago has been superseded by this season's super-straight, super-glossy extensions; the freckled, weather-beaten skin replaced by a silky, Caribbean tan (it tends to make for a better picture when those delicate, barely there peasant tops slip casually off a shoulder) and the widespread air of sorely exploited misery ditched in favour of a

Harvey Nichols charge card. You get the idea. Rustic is in — which is interesting because the other big in is Urban.

For those who mourn the waning of last season's coquettish prettiness, this is good news. Rustic is simply prettiness presented in a more rugged way — think embroidered linens rather than silks; cheesecloth instead of chiffon; and tiny Tanna lawn rosebud prints as opposed to full-blown roses. For those who usually adhere strictly to Urban, it's worth considering sneaking the occasional print into the scenario: these new seedlings are delicate without being fey, and at their best worn as a crisp shirt with jeans or something equally no-nonsense.

There is something wholesome, earthy and yet (this being the late Nineties) marvelously manicured about this new heroine. She is full of contradictions, not without her absurdities — in other words, she's really very likeable.

LUCINDA CHAMBERS
Fashion director at Vogue and British stylist of the year

What is your personal style?
Eclectic — because there is so much I love that I just can't stick to one look. I love to mix things up so I suppose that I'm seen as quite a hippy, but it does make life go with a swing. I never wear black — it's just not life-enhancing, and I never could manage looking smart.

If you could go back to any century, which would it be?
I would never want to go back to another time. People really suffered for fashion, they had no choice; instead, looks were dictated. For the first time fashion is utterly liberated. You can choose to be a boho hippy or a severe minimalist — the only problem is deciding who you want to be.

What is your favourite shop?
Cath Kidston in Notting Hill, West London — because we're both rose freaks and she has a fantastic mix of fashion and furniture.

Who is your style icon?
Simon, my husband. I find his disinterest in fashion and style

Lucinda Chambers and her son. "I'm seen as a hippy," she says to be marvellously liberating.

What three people, dead or alive, would you like to have dinner with?

St Philip Neri, a 16th-century priest who was known to play incredibly funny practical jokes as well as levitating while praying; Franz Schubert because of his incredible musical talent and his friends all loved him; and Isabella Bird, the Victorian traveller — she must have some great adventure stories.

What can you not leave the house without?
At the moment it's my Comme des Garçons perfume. It smells of Christmas and I try desperately to use it sparingly because it is so incredibly expensive.

What book are you reading at the moment?
Every Man for Himself by Beryl Bainbridge. When I like an author I tend to read everything that they have written. I really enjoy Bainbridge's style — it is evocative as well as spare.

What do you take on trips to make life easier?
A good book, pictures of my family and a big throw for when it gets cold on aircraft.

What is your style motto?
Be true to yourself.

The high-class matchmaker

Concetta Lanciaux has been instrumental in bringing some of fashion's biggest names to the world's attention, and has brokered many successful business 'marriages' between designers and couture houses.

Strictly in the line of duty, Concetta Lanciaux has scaled Manhattan lofts, teetered across cobblestone courtyards, and shivered in disused Shoreditch warehouses waiting for endless fashion happenings to commence. In her ceaseless search for the next big thing in fashion, no nascent name has been left uninvestigated, no radical new concept unexamined, no dilapidated studio unvisited.

Not once has her melon-slice of a smile slipped or the infectious twinkle in her eyes dimmed, not even when designers have chosen to present their collections in the dark, underground, ad nauseam, and for that alone she deserves a medal. Since joining Louis Vuitton Moët Hennessy, the world's largest luxury goods conglomerate nine years ago, she has become its talent scout, reporting directly to Bernard Arnault. LVMH's somewhat and the infamous egos, it is, one might imagine, the job from hell. Yet Lanciaux is a model of serenity. Despite the occasional cosy lunch with each of her protégés, she insists that "I am not there to act as their nanny", adding mischievously that "the company directors [whom she also recruits] do that. Anyway, if you do your homework well, you minimise the risks. The most important thing is to understand the company that you are recruiting for and to get to know the designers' personalities. When I was looking at Michael Kors for Celine, I realised they were compatible in so many ways. Michael had a roughed-up, casual way of doing chic, which was exactly what Celine had stood for in its heyday. He was passionate about quality fabrics but had a modern sensibility about glamour; he made it look nonchalant which is what Celine needed."

The Marc Jacobs courtship last-for Tom, he is so much part of Gucci and it is so much part of him that I'd be surprised if he did leave."

You can see why this is the kind of job that careers officers might describe as "absorbing". Lanciaux cheerfully admits to being a workaholic; she squeezed this interview in at 11pm in a hotel bar in Paris between a business dinner and, one hopes, a few hours' synergy with her husband, who's in insurance, or her son, who's in fashion, and possibly getting 40 winks before the next round of shows and deals. Shopping trips inevitably turn into market research. She now dresses in Givenchy diffusion and is thinking of branching out into Celine, and cannot pick up a copy of Vogue without making copious notes. No wonder she reads Socrates to relax.

It was not meant to be thus. She was encouraged by her mother to aim for a serious job — an unusual ambition for a woman from Fogia, in southern Italy, 50 years ago. One sister became a High Court judge, the other a doctor. Lanciaux herself taught Latin and Greek to "rich high school kids" in her school holidays until she had saved the money to come to London, where she ed much longer, "but when I visited his studio in SoHo in New York, I was so struck by how beautiful it was. He has very refined taste and very clear ideas about what he wants to do. At the end of the day we're looking for designers who can be autonomous."

None of the appointments has been without controversy. Among nationalists there was indignation at seeing venerable French houses fall into the creative directorships of foreigners. Elsewhere there is consternation at Arnault's apparent determination to build an internationally homogeneous empire — a fear that his current battle to gain control of Gucci and ensuing court case has done nothing to assuage. Tom Ford, the creative wizard largely responsible for the company's meteoric revival, is so unimpressed by Arnault's tactics that he has threatened to leave Gucci if Arnault wins. Lanciaux takes a predictably reassuring view. "There is nothing further from our minds than creating a bland global megabrand. The whole point is to build a strong identity for each house while providing them with a synergy [a favourite word] and an infrastructure that make them viable businesses. As stayed long enough to acquire flawless English and a taste for Ballantyne cashmere. After a stint writing film scripts and a book entitled The Art of Poetics, she became Professor of Film Studies at Pittsburgh University, then took a business degree. In 1985 she went to work for Arnault. "I love my work because it gives me the chance to be creative and use my business knowledge," she says.

To this end, all altruistic gestures are grounded in commercial reality; the courses she has helped to set up in various French fashion colleges on behalf of LVMH have become fertile recruiting ground for some of the company's 40,000 employees. The search for more designers to take LVMH into the next millennium continues, and if she has not yet signed up a woman, it is not for want of trying. "Jil Sander already had her own big company," she says wistfully. But she is keeping an eye on a newcomer, Sharon Waschob, as she is on Olivier Theyskens, Clements Ribeiro, Isabelle Ballieu. "I get such pleasure from seeing artists succeed," she says, "because when business and creativity get together successfully there's no limit to what you can achieve."

Lisa Armstrong, Fashion Editor

Concetta Lanciaux: "When business and creativity get together successfully there's no limit to what you can achieve"

That the unions are successful is clear, although inevitably there are rumours to the contrary. John Galliano, fashion's blue-eyed boy, whom Lanciaux was instrumental in bringing to Dior, is whispered by some to be in danger of losing his creative edge, and the house is thought to be struggling commercially — which, naturally, she denies. "You may not see women wearing Dior in the street, but it's not made for walking. It's for ladies who limo. Sales are up 40 per cent since John joined. We are all very happy." As indeed they should be: in column inches alone, Dior is extremely wealthy.

For someone who has been instrumental in bringing some of fashion's biggest names to the world's attention and wields the equivalent power of a Louis B. Mayer or a Sam Goldwyn when it comes to creating stars, she is remarkably unassuming and approachable. Small, with Latin curves as opposed to fashionable planes, among the tight-lipped, studiously stylised front-row personae, she passes unrecognised by all but a few industry insiders. Yet it was she who helped to sign up not just the two Brits (Alexander McQueen at Givenchy, John Galliano at Dior, who created such a publicity coup for Arnault) but the three New Yorkers — Michael Kors at Celine, Marc Jacobs at Louis Vuitton and Narciso Rodriguez at Loewe — who have helped to blow the dust off three musty established houses by importing their individual interpretations of sleek, wearable American sportswear to Paris.

When you consider the sums involved, the market fluctuations that can be triggered by a duff review

Kosovo, Northern Ireland and Scotland are each trying to answer the same question: how to reconcile different loyalties and identities within a single state. The strains have broken apart Yugoslavia over the past decade, as they did the former Soviet Union in 1991. Northern Ireland lives in an uneasy balance between conflict and repeated attempts at a new constitutional structure. The choices facing Scotland, and to a lesser extent Wales, are less extreme, but the question is the same. Can you be both Scots-Welsh and British? And, equally intractable, can you be both British and European?

The Unionist-Tory answer is no. The nation state remains supreme, as a focus of loyalty and political power. Anything that detracts from that is dangerous, whether the feared break-up of the United Kingdom is as a result of devolution or rule from Brussels.

Such a one-dimensional view will no longer do. The traditional nation state is already being transformed. Historians, notably Linda Colley in her Britons, have argued that Britain was largely a late 17th and 18th-century invention, a Protestant island threatened by a mainly Catholic Continent, especially France. But in the absence of such dangers, and with the end of empire, the pressures that held Britain together have disappeared. That may lead to looser links within Britain and a resumption of the previous close involvement with the rest of Europe.

In response, Tories argue that the British identity has existed for hundreds of years — though most references are to England, not Britain. That is both true and beside the point. Britain now has a different and more complex meaning. For instance, sport is no longer defined by national or linguistic boundaries. In the part of North London where I live, I would bet that the most admired person is French. Arsène Wenger, the manager of Arsenal, whose leading goalkeepers are French and Dutch. That does not make Arsenal supporters any less patriotic.

The nation state will remain the primary political unit with which people identify, not least because of its democratic legitimacy, but it is no longer the sole one. The challenges are not just constitutional. The way we live and work is becoming much more international, through the Internet, television and everything summed up by the term globalisation. Society is also more diverse, with the two-parent family no longer almost the sole publicly acceptable option (though it is still the majority one). Moreover, as Robert Cooper, one of the cleverest British diplomats, argues in the current Prospect, a weakening of the State and national identities may bring more divided societies.

The most pressing test is devolution. The revived Scottish sense of national identity has had some crudely anti-English manifestations, in films such as Braveheart. But conflict is not inherent. It is possible to be both Scottish and British. A MORI poll last July for the Institute of Citizenship showed that more than three quarters of the public felt they belonged very or fairly strongly to their local communities; to England, Scotland or Wales; and to Great Britain.

Reconciling these different loyalties contains many traps. For the Left, there is the danger of multiculturalism, of abandoning a common history or culture and treating the experience of all ethnic and minority groups as equally significant. History is already taught in America solely from a black or feminist perspective (will British history be taught just from a Scottish standpoint?). That is not only historical nonsense but it also creates a sense of group grievance which fragments society.

The Right is torn between recognising the existence of a more diverse society and denying its implications. The Tories want to reach out to minority groups, yet are drawn to a caricature Daily Mail version of the family defined by which party offers bigger tax reliefs to couples. William Hague is instinctively pluralist, yet seems reluctant to acknowledge that this can involve a modest decentralisation of power away from London. It is all or nothing: the United Kingdom or a break-up into its constituent nations.

As Vernon Bogdanor argues in his new book Devolution in the United Kingdom, there is a profound contradiction in Unionist thinking. While regarding Britain as a deep-rooted organic entity, Unionists-Tories are worried that British identity is so fragile that it can be put at risk by the constitutional reforms of one Government. Some Tories relish the prospect of a break with Scotland as an opportunity for an English nationalist reawakening, as Simon Heffer does in his new book (in effect a polemical tract) Nor Shall My Sword: The Reinvention of England. The official line is still Unionist but the Tory party is confused, as shown by the continuing muddle over the idea of an English parliament.

The arguments over devolution are parallel to those over Europe. Sceptics argue that it is impossible to be both British and European. According to the MORI poll quoted above, only a third of the public feel they strongly belong to Europe. This is far less than on the Continent, where the French have no problem in feeling they belong both to France and to Europe. Yet that is what will have to happen if Britain is to be a successful member of the European Union. Tony Blair writes this morning in Newsweek about a "new internationalism", a new doctrine to deal with brutal repression of the kind seen in Kosovo. Managing such multiple identities and loyalties — local, regional, national, European and international, as well as social — is now the trickiest task for our political leaders.

The man for Auntie

Andrew Neil might not want to run the BBC, but he would be an ideal candidate

The Governors of the BBC are choosing a new Director-General to succeed Sir John Birt. It is a make-or-buy decision for the future of the BBC. Unless the new Director-General, who will not take office until next April, can master a complex series of technological, production, editorial, financial, marketing and administrative problems, the BBC will probably become one of Britain's obsolete ceremonial institutions, like the hereditary peers. Even its financial basis, the licence fee, is at risk. The Governors are not looking for any ordinary Director-General; they are looking for a superman or superwoman.

It is absolutely the Governors' choice. I was BBC vice-chairman when we chose Alastair Milne in 1982. We did not consult the Government of the day, and it would have been fatal to any candidate's chances to have been regarded as Margaret Thatcher's preference. So far as I know, she did not have one: she probably disapproved equally of all the candidates. When one reads in the press that the next Director-General will have to be acceptable to Tony Blair, I'm sure that is untrue. The Governors will choose the person they believe best for the job, and the Prime Minister will have to accept their choice.

Last Friday ONdigital announced that by the end of March it had already signed up 110,000 subscribers; by February, the figure for SkyDigital was 350,000. By the time the new Director-General takes over from John Birt, the combined digital audience will be well over a million households. Current research suggests that it may be more than 12 million by the time that his first five-year term has ended. By 2005, the analogue age will be over, and the digital age will be the reality.

The BBC was established in the early 1920s as a monopoly broadcaster, dependent on monopoly funding. This broadcasting monopoly has been eroded in three stages: by the introduction of Independent Television in the 1950s, by satellite broadcasting in the late 1980s and 1990s, and now by the rapid spread of digital, funded largely on a subscription basis, and capable of providing an indefinite number of competing channels.

The BBC's response to the first competitive challenge was successful. Independent Television produced some excellent and innovative programmes, and won the high ratings advertisers called for, but the BBC always answered back. In terms of public confidence, or of the quality of output, the 30 years of limited competition between terrestrial channels was ideal for the BBC. That period, remembered by BBC producers for Hugh Carleton Greene's tenure as Director-General, was the BBC's golden age. Competition provided a spur; the limitation to four terrestrial channels provided a protection.

The BBC was much less successful in meeting the competition from satellite broadcasting, using the old analogue system. Sky was able to win a substantial share of the market, and has come to dominate terrestrial sport. The BBC tried various responses: some failed altogether and none was a real success. In some ways, the BBC's response under John Birt to the digital challenge has been more coherent. He took the unpopular course of diverting substantial sums to the creation of new channels, the 24-hour news and BBC Choice; they were bound to have a small audience to begin with, but are likely to have a growing audience as digital grows.

As a digital subscriber, I already find myself watching BBC Choice as a way of catching good programmes I had missed. John Birt has understood that the BBC's role in the digital period must be as a high-quality producer. My judgment is that he badly underestimated sport. A well-funded BBC sports channel must have been considered, and should have been created.

The digital response by the BBC makes better sense from that of Independent Television. The BBC's instinct has been to raise programme quality and seek the best available slots on digital platforms, which are as valuable to a broadcaster as landing rights at Heathrow are to an airline. Independent Television took the grotesque decision to refuse to provide its main channel to SkyDigital; it has gone downmarket, actually abolishing its anchor programme of the News at Ten. The combination may prove disastrous. In my case, ITV has fallen from about 25 per cent of my total viewing to about 5 per cent and other SkyDigital viewers say much the same.

John Birt will not, therefore, be leaving a legacy in which all the wrong decisions have already been made. He will, however, be leaving at a very early stage of the digital revolution; this is where the French Revolution was early in 1789, before the Bastille had fallen.

What will need to be done will be essentially entrepreneurial. The BBC needs to build on its strengths to dominate the top half of the new broadcasting market that is being created. It does not need to compete at the tabloid or Jerry Springer level, which would alienate its natural supporters and viewers. In newspaper terms, the core BBC audience ranges from the mid-market tabloid to the broadsheet, from the Daily Mail to The Times or the Financial Times. The new Director-General must be someone who understands that audience. There are plenty of signs in the Discovery Channel or the History Channel that the demand is there: the BBC could meet it much better.

The new Director-General will need to be much more than a good editor-in-chief. The BBC's greatest weakness is that it was too strong a monopoly for too long; that always makes it difficult to change, and almost impossible to change fast. One of the reasons Sky out-competed the BBC with satellite broadcasting was that it was a new company, with the energy and flexibility such a business can have. The next Director-General will have to teach the old elephant to dance a new tune.

There is one man who might get it right. I doubt if he wants the job, but if he did, my recommendation would do him little good. I do not believe anyone from inside the BBC will be able to handle the challenge, because the BBC's own culture, its inability to see itself from the outside, is so large a part of the problem. There are many good people inside the BBC, and they are individually capable of self-criticism, but they have inevitably been indoctrinated by the culture. They have not gone native: they are naive. The candidate I would go for, to save the BBC, would be Andrew Neil.

He was undoubtedly a great Editor of the 1980s. He is one of three past Editors of The Sunday Times — Denis Hamilton and Harold Evans were predecessors — who over 30 years made that paper the pre-eminent Sunday broadsheet. In the late 1990s, as Editor-in-Chief of The Scotsman, he has built another world-class newspaper.

Quite recently I switched from The Guardian to The Scotsman, mainly because I was interested in following the elections to the Scottish parliament. I shall stay with it, because it is the better paper of the two, with a stronger news judgment, crisper, less predictable, less self-satisfied, less sarcastic, with a wider range of interests. One must also credit the excellent Editor, Alan Ruddock.

Andrew is a bonnie fighter, as Glasgow Scots are supposed to be. He was much influenced by working for Rupert Murdoch, who runs a masterclass for ambitious media men which has other distinguished graduates. Andrew knows about quality, and believes in it. He knows about international broadcasting. He can read a balance sheet. I am not sure that Andrew could save the BBC, or that anyone could, but he provides a good measuring rod. The next Director-General has at least to match him on editorial experience, business sense, energy, leadership qualities, and in his ruthless capacity for creating change. Any Director-General who cannot meet the Neil standard will not be able to master the revolution. If he fails, the BBC itself may end on the guillotine of history.

Out of harmony

TOM JONES, recently honoured with an OBE, has repaid the favour by attacking the "divisive" politics of Sean Connery. The Welsh singer, below left, accuses Connery — whose support for Scottish independence scuppered plans to award him a knighthood — of jeopardising the British "identity". "The British Isles is small enough as it is, we don't want to make it any smaller," says Jones, displaying renewed pride in Queen and country. His lifting words come as his fellow Celt, right, prepares to campaign for the SNP in the Scottish parliamentary elections. "I'm very proud of being Welsh," Jones adds hurriedly. "But I don't want to split this island up. United we stand, divided we fall."

GLENDIA JACKSON tires of the "assumption" that her Hampstead constituency teems with pampered Blairites and champagne Socialists. "It irritates me that Hampstead is continually associated with these sorts of people," barks Ms Jackson. "Deprivation does exist there."

■ CURRY supplies to the Dome are in jeopardy: the company hired to serve vindaloes on Millennium Eve is threatening to pull out after "stringent" conditions were imposed by Lord Falconer of Thoroton. The Chutney Mary group (its name is Raj-speak for a Westernised Indian woman) expects to prepare 2,000 curries a day in a 45-seat restaurant, but its owners — who featured in a recent list of the country's richest Asians — are revolting. "There is a distinct possibility we will not go ahead because of the terms," says Ranjit Mathrani.

The "outrageous" conditions, which also bind other Dome caterers, include the right for Falconer to sack the catering staff, to force operators to carry adverts for sponsors and to terminate the agreement with ten days' notice. "It is the same as for any major event," insists a Dome spokesman.

HOW delightful that the Duchess of Devonshire (above, with the Duke) should stay abreast of modern life's more bracing features. After Chatsworth House was placed on a "stately home ride" by a local train company, Her Grace — grandest of the Mitford sisters — noted to friends that the railways' offer of "service in your seat" makes it sound "like a lap-dancing club".

■ IS Marco Pierre White retrenching? The restaurateur has ditched plans to open up in his home town of Leeds to attend to his budding career with the palette (Damien Hirst's work on the walls of Quo Vadis is being replaced by MPW's own daubs). "Oh, you know what Marco's like," offers a friend. "He changes his mind all the time."

THE course of true love has not run smoothly for the RSC's A Midsummer Night's Dream in Stratford-upon-Avon: a party of Roman Catholic children was marched out by teachers alarmed at a simulated sex scene involving Bottom. Says the RSC: "It is not a fluffy fairies production."

■ THE architect Sir Norman Foster is having trouble with neighbours: his efforts to erect an extra floor on his Thameside penthouse have led to skirmishes in the area (which shelters Neil and Christine Hamilton, and Vivienne Westwood's studio) after one of his tollers blocked off a pavement to carry out the work. "There was an unauthorised closure," my yellow-haired chum on Wandsworth council tells me. "So we went down to read the Riot Act."

TO warn of the dangers of drink, Tessa Jowell, Minister for Public Health, will next week launch "Cheers Without Tears" — at a champagne reception.

'The most sensible thing would be to declare an amnesty — that way Russia's richest people would not be fleeing the country in droves'

Who is guilty? Where is the money? These are two questions which have obsessed Russians since the beginning of the perestroika era. The answers are almost everyone and mostly in Switzerland. This, obviously, is not enough to satisfy your newly information-hungry Russian, eager to blame somebody for his poverty and preferably somebody rich and powerful.

As more and more time and money are spent trying to come up with satisfactory and coherent responses to the nagging questions above, the answers become increasingly obscured in conspiracy theories and new allegations of corruption. The moment somebody launches an investigation into somebody else's guilt, then compromising information immediately emerges either implicating the investigator in the original crime or accusing them of involvement in a crime far worse.

The current witch-hunt against Boris Berezovsky (Russia's favourite billionaire villain) and other tycoons who have long been labelled "oligarchs" by people who do not understand what the word means is symptomatic of a general feeling that somebody somewhere has ruined Russia and stolen all her money. A warrant was issued last week for Berezovsky's arrest (he is now in Paris having a nice time with all his money) and he has promised to return home soon to face charges of money-laundering and illegal business activity, though few seriously expect him to show up. And why should he?

Anyone who has made vast sums of money in Russia over the past decade has done so by means which are at the very least dubious. However, at the time when Berezovsky and his like were building their empires they were the only ones building anything at all and there was nothing stopping them. The legal system of the Soviet Union had collapsed and nothing had effectively replaced it.

Bribes and threats could buy you whatever you wanted (such as the right to export oil owned by the Government and keep the profits), such that all the shady, get-rich-quick schemes employed by the new robber barons were sanctioned by bribed officials, and were, for the most part, not technically speaking illegal. Whether or not they were glaringly unethical is a different question, but what few would deny is that they would probably have done the same had they thought of it.

Lashing out at people who can so easily be used as scapegoats for Russia's ills is a cheap shot on the part of the Primakov Government, which is desperately keen to be seen fighting corruption. The likelihood of Berezovsky or Aleksandr Smolensky, of SBS-Agro, ever serving a prison sentence is infinitesimally small, and the agony of separation they will suffer as exiles in the West is doubtful. Any money that might have gone missing by their hands will never be seen again.

Constant allegations of embezzlement are stopping Russia from getting on with the job in hand, that is, recovering from the crisis of last August. Nobody is likely to provide loans for or invest in a country whose main obsession is the apportioning of blame, rather than the seeking of solutions. Did somebody steal a massive cut of the IMF and World Bank loans? Possibly, but they did not take as much money as the conspiracy theorists would like to believe, and the vast majority of IMF funds at least did go into stabilising the rouble, rightly or wrongly (well, OK, probably wrongly).

Somebody suggested to me the other day that the most sensible thing to do, since it is impossible to legislate retrospectively, would be to declare an amnesty on illegal and semi-legal business dealings that took place before the beginning of 1999. That way Russia's richest people would not be fleeing the country in droves and the powers-that-be would not feel compelled to carry out expensive, pointless and always personally motivated investigations against the businessmen who annoy them most.

Investigate anyone, Russian or Western, who has made a lot of money here and it is likely that you would find something that would soon have them sipping a café crime with Berezovsky and Anatoli Sobchak (the former Mayor of St Petersburg) on the banks of the Seine.

Who gets investigated is a fairly random decision, dependent only on who has control over the Prosecutor General at any given time. Everybody knows that Yevgeni Primakov, the Prime Minister, harbours a great deal of animosity towards Boris Berezovsky. That is not to defend Berezovsky and all his dealings, but as they say here: "If I'm the boss, you're a fool. If you're the boss, I'm a fool."

THUNDER IN ULSTER

London and Dublin must not weaken now

While Western eyes have turned in pity and horror towards the Balkans over the past week there has been an ominous crackle in the Ulster air. The thunder may not be far behind. Northern Ireland's parties reconvene for talks this week in a spirit of hope, but a posture of fear. Progress in the peace process has, so far, depended on a willingness among democrats to postpone the central test of good faith from those who have practised terror in the past. The requirement that parties linked to paramilitaries secure the decommissioning of weapons before they enjoy executive power over their fellow citizens has been sidelined in the search for agreement on every other issue. Now that issue can no longer be dodged. And the fearful prospect looms that those who have advanced with Armalite and ballot box are married to the former and have only been using the latter.

On the eve of the anniversary of the Good Friday agreement, the British and Irish Prime Ministers unveiled a declaration intended to give fresh impetus towards the implementation of that agreement. They sketched a clear, and speedy, route to a Northern Ireland in which all parties could play their part. All that was required from paramilitary organisations was that some arms "be placed beyond use". Such a voluntary release of weapons from the terrorist grip would be rendered more palatable by a Day of Reconciliation, which would "draw the sting from any notion of surrender". Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern had done everything reasonable leaders might, indeed more than many would, to ease the paramilitaries' path to participation in government.

The response has not been encouraging. Sinn Féin's chief negotiator, Martin McGuinness, responded to the Blair-Ahern itinerary for progress with a journey backwards into bloodstained history. He declared that "the demeanour of republicanism from time immemorial clearly shows they are not going to bend the knee to the demands of...the British military establishment". The senior IRA man, Brian Keenan, has been crisply negative, addressing a rally in Monaghan with the words: "I don't know where they get this idea of decommissioning, because it strikes me they mean it like it is surrender. There will be no surrender."

Mr Keenan's rhetoric has found an answering call in the brute intransigence of loyalist paramilitaries who have refused to consider any decommissioning of their own arms. Words may be cheap, but so, as far as the terrorists are still concerned, are lives. The Unionist leader, David Trimble, hopes that there may be some room for manoeuvre in the week ahead. His capacity to conjure hope from despair has surprised pessimists before. But the decisive turn away from violence which he has, rightly, made a precondition of full republican participation in any Ulster executive still seems beyond reach.

In their anxiety to keep the peace process alive both London and Dublin are pre-empting Sinn Féin demands. The Irish Government has released the Balcombe Street bombers; the British is to scale down troop numbers and dismantle military installations. Both moves, though worrying for Ulster's democratic majority, might be considered reasonable in the context of a new Northern Ireland where guns really were silent. But while weapons remain primed in terrorist hands, such concessions could prove premature. The urgent need now is not for indulgence of terrorist wishes, but an insistence on democratic rights, and a preparedness to defend them against those who demand flexibility without ever showing it.

THE PACE QUICKENS

Diplomacy and military operations must step up together

Nato foreign ministers meet today as the pace of diplomacy quickens in step with the pace of war. The special session has been called by Madeleine Albright, as much to reaffirm Nato's aims and take stock of the war so far as to prepare a unified Nato response to Russia's warnings. Ms Albright meets Igor Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, tomorrow, and amid a flurry of diplomatic consultations will reaffirm the West's eagerness to include Russia in the diplomatic pressure on Belgrade — though not, she will insist, as an apologist for Serbian intransigence.

Nato ambassadors, meanwhile, agreed at the weekend to deploy a humanitarian mission of up to 8,000 Nato troops in Albania to cope with more than 300,000 refugees now overwhelming Europe's poorest country. Only a military force can deal with a catastrophe of such proportions. Albania has neither roads, food, stability nor law; its Government cannot possibly ensure that humanitarian aid is not looted, transport it to the refugee camps or organise proper distribution. Even a Nato force will find the going difficult.

There is a danger in the dispatch of these troops, however. Politicians, frustrated by Nato's failure to protect the fleeing refugees, may be tempted to see the force as part of an embryo invasion force for a ground war. They will look also to neighbouring Macedonia, where a further 12,000 Nato peacekeepers were deployed to implement whatever peace agreement was signed at Rambouillet. There was no deal, and for the foreseeable future they have no mission, apart from doing what they can for the Kosovans who have reached Macedonia. Could they not, some will ask, also be reassigned as the vanguard of a ground force that many insist must eventually be deployed to clear the way for the refugees' return?

Nato planners are aghast at such suggestions. The 8,000 sent to Albania will not be equipped for any interventionist role; without tanks, self-propelled artillery and armoured combat vehicles they cannot enter Kosovo. Similarly, the force in Macedonia is armed only to protect itself in the enforcement of peace. It would have the muscle to intervene in sporadic flare-ups; but this is very different from taking on the full force of the Yugoslav Army preparing to fight a last-ditch battle against an invading force.

Some Western politicians have suggested that Nato should start preparing for a ground invasion if only to convince President Milosevic that the alliance is ready to ratchet up the conflict to whatever force level is needed for victory. In this scenario, the existing troops, augmented by others brought into the region by stealth, would suddenly converge into an invasion force of more than 100,000. The difficulty here is that Nato has explicitly, and repeatedly, ruled out such a force. And Mr Milosevic has all the evidence he needs that the alliance should be taken at its word. If enough men are to be mustered on the ground for eventual combat, they and their equipment need to be boarding ships now. They are not. It is therefore inconceivable that any ground force will be deployed within the next three months.

The pace of war will instead be quickened in other ways. Intensified diplomacy must be linked to the destruction of Yugoslavia's military machine. That, Ms Albright will tell Mr Ivanov, remains the aim. And the sooner Russia joins the diplomatic push, the sooner the airstrikes will stop.

NOUVEAUX RICHES

Time for a little vulgar ostentation

The rich are getting richer, but they are also changing in more subtle ways, a list of Britain's wealthiest 1,000 people published yesterday in The Sunday Times suggests. Relatively speaking, the super-rich today are far better off than their economic counterparts of a century or two ago. The wealthiest man in the land in 1799, Earl Grosvenor, owned assets which would be worth £750 million today. Hans Rausing, whose family's Tetra Laval carton-making business has put him above Lord Sainsbury of Turville at the top of this year's list, is worth a cool £3,400 million. Despite global economic turbulence over the past year, and fears of impending recession, the continued strong performance of the stock market has kept generating wealth. The top 1,000 were worth £115 billion as recently as January, but their assets have probably grown another £10 billion since.

Importantly for the country's entrepreneurial future, too, most of the new multimillionaires are self-made. The percentage whose wealth is inherited has shrunk from nearly two thirds a decade ago to less than one third today. A

But perhaps the most curious thing about the current generation of multimillionaires is how little they flaunt their wealth. They may own the odd yacht or island in the sun; occasionally, one may attempt to fly around the world in a balloon. But today's list boasts no one who comes close to the sheer in-your-face ostentation of the nouveaux riches of the past. On the whole, the rich of 1999 are a well-adjusted and sober lot. Having money does not make them think mink. Instead, they wear jeans. They avoid fatty food. They anxiously limit their alcohol intake. Many live so modestly that it is impossible to guess the extent of their wealth from their behaviour. The most unassuming of all, the computer whizz-kids, even go by the unexciting nickname of "anoraks".

Their entrepreneurial skill is to be celebrated, as is the good taste that stops them rubbing their success in the face of the poor. Yet some may look back with a hint of nostalgic affection at the flamboyance of another era's millionaires. Lady Docker, wife of a Birmingham industrialist in the 1950s, was perhaps the most excessive of her ilk. Her extraordinary

Balkan lessons of recent past

From Mr Robin O'Neill

Sir, To call for a protectorate in Macedonia (article, "Macedonia deserves short shrift", March 7) is arrogant neo-colonialism. What Macedonia needs is help from the rest of Europe in consolidating its position as an independent state — and that consolidation will itself solve the Macedonian question.

Macedonia's name matters here. To go on calling it the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia suggests that it still really forms part of Milosevic's Yugoslavia and should go back there. Some of Macedonia's enemies — but not its citizens — would still like that to happen.

When, in 1992, I attempted on behalf of the Presidency of the European Community (then held by the United Kingdom) to resolve the dispute between Greece and Macedonia over the latter's name, the Greeks suggested that for Macedonia to take the name Republic of Macedonia would destabilise the region. That was not true then, and the past seven years have proved it not to be true. The international community could now help Macedonia to survive in a difficult environment by calling it the Republic of Macedonia — which, incidentally, under international law it is entitled to call itself.

There is much in James Pettifer's article which, as a regular visitor to Macedonia, since 1992, I do not recognise. President Gligorov, alone in the region, has exercised a consistently moderating role as a political leader over the past eight years, not least with his fellow countrymen.

He has done that in order to ensure Macedonia's survival from Serbia, as well as to preserve it from the ethnic breakdown which has afflicted its neighbours. And if Macedonia is still run by communists, in or out of the Ministry of Interior, how is it that the ex-Communist Party in power was defeated in the 1998 general election, and the present Government is led by the nationalist party, VMRO?

Macedonia has a long way to go — it had a difficult birth — but the stability of the Balkans requires that it survives, and flourishes, in independence.

Yours faithfully,
ROBIN O'NEILL,
4 Castle Street,
Saffron Walden, Essex CB10 1BP,
April 7.

From Mr Adrian Hope

Sir, In May 1991 I stood in Trafalgar Square with a small but noisy group of Croats, Bosnians, Slovenians and Kosovans. We were demonstrating for external intervention to prevent the policy of genocide which we all believed the Serbian authorities to be planning.

I remember with gratitude the contribution of a representative of Plaid Cymru but we were too marginal a group, too absurd with our demands, too paranoid in our predictions to receive either hearing or sympathy from any of the main political parties.

That day I carried a banner: "Serbia's Final Solution" (letters, April 8). It was deliberately provocative. Any declaration in favour of an independent Croatia attracted the suspicion of fascist sympathies and the banner was intended to turn the suspicion back on the accusers. Even though I wrote the banner myself, I did feel at the time that it was perhaps over the top.

How wrong I was.

Yours etc,
ADRIAN HOPE,
54 Brunswick Gardens, W8 4AN,
April 8.

German medals

From Mr Nigel Sisson

Sir, There is a straightforward solution to the problem of how to reward the new generation of Luftwaffe pilots now risking their lives in combat in the Balkans (report, April 7).

As part of a Nato combined operation, surely they are engaged in the "broader war" with which many Germans will feel more comfortable; and this should be recognised by a Nato campaign medal common to the Alliance. Wasn't this what happened with a common UN medal in Korea?

Yours faithfully,
NIGEL SISSON, Skerryvore,
Woodside Close,
Deringham, Norfolk PE31 6QD,
April 7.

From Mrs Christine Viridi

Sir, How long must Germany carry the cross of guilt?

In the Second World War, within the ranks of the three regular services, many Germans fought for their country with the same honour as those of the Allied forces. The Iron Cross medal is synonymous with Germany and his recognition of bravery.

Therefore, their pilots should be awarded an updated version of the Iron Cross, and wear it with pride. No one can be offended by bravery.

Proposals for schoolteachers' pay

From Mr Jonathan Cox

Sir, The Government's proposals on teachers' pay (reports, April 5-7) are doubtless well intentioned but are characterised by ignorance of good teaching practice.

The whole idea of rewarding good classroom teachers is to say to them: "You are doing a good job in the classroom and we want to reward you for it so you can carry on, where you are, with the good work." Unfortunately this will not happen because, in order to break through the "performance threshold", a good classroom teacher will have to take on extra responsibilities outside the classroom: this will (as it does now) distract them from their most important responsibility and use up a disproportionate amount of their limited time on whatever additional tasks their head teacher gives them. The quality of their performance in the classroom will inevitably deteriorate.

Yours etc,
JONATHAN COX,
15 Longley Road, Harrow HA1 4TG, joncoxc@comp.net

From Mrs Theresa May, MP for Maidenhead (Conservative)

Sir, If the Conservatives were simply supporting those teacher unions who have threatened strikes in their opposition to the Government's proposals for performance-related pay, as your leading article ("Chalk and Cheese", April 7) implies, that indeed would be incredible. But we are not.

We condemn proposals for strike action (as your leader makes clear). Such action not only lets down children in our schools; it also lets down the teaching profession.

We support the concept of appraisal

ing teachers' performance and rewarding good teachers. We also want good teachers to be able to stay in our classrooms doing what they are good at — teaching children. We want to see flexibility at local level and schools and teachers set free to get on with the job of educating children to high standards.

What we oppose is a centrally controlled, bureaucratic, mechanistic approach which it has been calculated will cost £250 million to put into place and £130 million each year to administer, and which could take good teachers out of the classroom. That is the reality of the Government's proposals.

Yet again we see the Government talking the language of business when the reality of its policy is bureaucracy and centralisation.

Yours faithfully,
THERESA MAY
(Shadow Schools Minister),
House of Commons,
April 7.

From Mr E. L. Stuart

Sir, It is regrettable that your desire to buttress the case for performance-related pay for teachers should lead you to state that "One of the most elementary features of a profession is that of individual contracts."

Are those employed in the Home Civil Service or the Foreign Service not members of a profession? Are not medical practitioners and other highly qualified NHS staff, to say nothing of others paid from public funds, such as Members of Parliament?

I am, yours faithfully,

Using VAT to maintain churches

From Miss Anne McIntosh, MEP for North Essex and South Suffolk European People's Party Parliamentary Group (Conservative)

Sir, As you say in your leading article, "Treasure in Heaven" (April 5), the Church does indeed need a tax break to help it to repair and maintain its historic buildings. You mention the Government's excuse that its "hands are tied by an EU Directive which excludes repairs to historic buildings in the list of items accepted as eligible for a lower (rate of) VAT."

This is simply not the case. The Government's hands are tied only by its unwillingness to forgo the vast VAT receipts it receives from the Church in repairs to historic buildings. The revised EU proposal announced this February can perfectly well be applied to repairs to historic buildings, unlike the previous EU proposal on this subject, and the Government should commit itself to promoting it in the Council of Ministers. To my knowledge, this is almost certainly the only occasion in which "Brussels" has offered to lower our taxes, so I would have thought that the Government would be keen to make the most of it.

In both answers to my Parliamentary Question and letters on this issue, the Government has always refused to commit itself to pushing through this VAT cut. Dawn Primarolo actually said to me in a letter in April last year that "using the VAT system to relieve the burden [on the Church] is an inefficient way of helping to preserve our national heritage". Or, in other words, the Government appears to believe it is more efficient to take money from the Church in the form of VAT on repairs, waste money on administration, and then give some (but not all) of this money back to the Church in the form of an English Heritage grant. Is it possible that the man (or woman) in Whitehall does not know best, and that parishes know better how to spend money on repairs than government officials?

The European Commission is, amazingly, offering to lower our taxes and to make the parishioners and clergy of Britain dance for joy by reducing the cost of repairs to historic buildings. Why is the Government not taking advantage of this unprecedented offer?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
ANNE MCINTOSH
(Conservative MP for Vale of York), European Parliament,
Rue Wiertz,
CB-1047 Brussels,
April 7.

From Mr Roger M. Hancock

Sir, I wholeheartedly support your leader. It is surely not unreasonable to ask that the minority of the population who are now active church and chapel members be offered some relief from maintaining the vitally important architectural heritage represented by our cathedrals, parish churches and chapels.

The small rural parish churches are particularly vulnerable, and parochial church councils are finding it increasingly difficult to raise their annual "quota" for ministers' stipends, as well as the cash needed every year to maintain the fabric of their churches. Many churches and chapels are in great danger of closure in the coming years. The lower VAT rate proposed in your leader would indeed seem like manna from Heaven if it materialised.

Loss of contact

From Dr A. A. Surgeon-Frame

Sir, I recently wanted to contact a dental patient of mine in Malvern and dialled Directory Enquiries. The lady said he was unlisted. Since he had his own business, I thought that unlikely.

She then told me that she had never heard of Malvern: she was working in Durham. She explained that the inquiry was dealt with by anyone who picked up my call.

Next time I got a singing Scots accent, emanating from Glasgow, but again no luck with my inquiry. Nevertheless, the lady was extremely pleasant.

Nothing daunted, I tried once more; this time I was on to a Stoke-on-Trent lady. She said she knew Malvern well. This was not relevant, but assuming the address to be correct, she would see if any business was listed there. Contact was then made successfully.

Later that morning I tried a York number, seeking another patient with a distinctive name. A lady in Lincoln answered, called me "Sir" about six times (had omen) and I got a nil response. I tried the dreaded Directory Enquiries again and returned depressingly to Lincoln, where the lady who had previously brushed me off was again the recipient of my inquiry. For the second time I experienced a total lack of success. I decided to retire hurt.

Yours sincerely,
ALISTAIR SURGEON-FRAME,

British citizenship

From Mr Michael Pickett

Sir, Mr Piers Litherland (letter, April 7) asks if it is right that any child born in Britain, even the child of a refugee, illegal immigrant or a tourist, should have full British citizenship, whereas he, born in erstwhile Rhodesia, does not. The answer is that it is not right.

Mr Litherland is a British citizen by descent with the right of abode by virtue of the fact that his father was born in the United Kingdom. The hapless child born in the UK to a refugee, illegal immigrant, or a tourist spending a few weeks here takes the nationality of its parents. Prior to the Nationality Act 1981 such a child would have been a citizen of the UK and colonies whatever the status of the parents.

Yours faithfully,
MICHAEL PICKETT

Living museum to play instruments

From Mr Robert L. Barclay

Sir, Plans for the Royal Academy of Music's "living museum" (report, April 7) have been public knowledge for some time. However, what has probably not been revealed before is the daft sentimentality that underlies the motive for restoring, maintaining and playing this valuable collection of historic instruments.

The observations by Curtis Price, Principal of the Academy, that historic instruments "die" if they are not played, and that "if wood isn't exercised... it becomes rigid and stiffens up" are well worn rubbish supported by no shred of evidence. Furthermore, his observation that "if you see an instrument, you want to know what it sounds like" ignores the proven facts that the tone of the instrument comes from a) the person who is at the moment playing it and b) the instrument technician who last prepared it for playing.

There is no such thing as a "Stradivari sound", but there is most definitely a "Menuhin sound". We always know who is playing, but we never can guess what instrument is being played. This has been proven over and over again, for well over a century.

The sound one hears has no relationship to any "historical" quality that the instrument may possess; thus, to prepare an historic instrument for playing (which can be a highly invasive and irreversible process) rather than using a well-made modern copy is to be self-indulgent at the expense of the cultural heritage.

It seems to me that input from any museum advisory organisation is, so far, woefully absent. Decisions upon the disposition of such a valuable collection must be taken by a team of qualified individuals from a wide range of fields, not left to the whims of bankrupt Victorian romanticism.

I would urge Curtis Price to assemble a panel of experts from the fields of musicology, organology, conservation and restoration and to charge them with producing a structured decision-making methodology so that the unique qualities of these historic instruments may be protected. With such a strategy in place it may still be possible to indulge transient, personal musical delight, but it won't happen at the expense of the material from which such sentiments are evoked.

Sincerely,
(Senior Conservator,
Musical Instruments, Canadian Conservation Institute),
3609 Downpatrick Road,
Gloucester, Ontario K1V 9P4,
April 7.

From Mr Andy Lamb

Sir, I was dismayed to read of the plans to use £14 million of public funds to develop the Royal Academy of Music's private collection of instruments.

Dr Curtis Price is wrong if he thinks that this is a new concept. Institutions such as the Canadian Museum of Civilisation, the Horniman Museum, the Musical Museum, in Brenford, Middlesex, and the Paris Conservatoire all have extensive programmes of concerts, lectures and workshops. Indeed, each has wide-ranging public-access schedules for all levels of society.

As for plans for the consistent use of the instruments: there can be no excuse for what I regard as the inevitable destruction of cultural heritage. Musicians are notoriously ham-fisted and limiting the use of the instruments to a cultural elite does not make a sound argument for the use of public funds.

Yours faithfully,
ANDY LAMB

Wedding gifts

From Mrs C. M. McLean

Sir, My most appreciated wedding present (letters, April 2, 5, 8 etc) — in 1948 — was the small collection of clothing coupons given me by colleagues in the publishing office where I worked at the time.

Clothes rationing was still in force, but these precious extra coupons enabled me to buy the material for my wedding dress.

Pepys's secrets?

From Mr Roderick L. Denyer, QC

Sir, "Samuel Pepys frequented [Bermondsey's] pleasure gardens with his children," writes Jamie Ross ("In love with Shakespeare's London", Home, April 7).

Odd that Pepys himself forgot to mention those children in his Diary. Perhaps this was something else he hid from his long-suffering wife.

WRENS are common this spring after the mild winter, and are building their domed nests in ivy or in thick Bramble bushes. The male make as many as five nests in their territory in order to attract a mate. Robins are beginning to make their mossy nests in holes in hedgebanks or behind loose bark on tree trunks. More summer migrants are arriving, including yellow wagtails in wet meadows and ring ouzels among the sprouting reeds on the moors, and the first cuckoos should be heard in the treeps this week. Willow warblers are beginning their soft cadences in the bright green birchwoods.

The first cow parsley is opening and before long the country lanes will be edged with its white, lacy flowers. Buttercups are coming out in the fields; in the sunshine, the orange pollen on the stamens is reflected in the shiny yellow petals. Daisies dot the lawns and red deadnettle forms pink pools on waste ground.

Horse-chestnut trees are like green towers; on some of them, the pyramidal white flowers are open. On hornbeam trees the long catkins clangle beside the half-open leaves.

OBITUARIES

THE EARL OF GUILFORD

The Earl of Guilford, landowner, died on March 26 aged 65. He was born on September 22, 1933.

THE 9th Earl of Guilford fought a long losing battle to develop and maintain Waldersea Park, his family seat in Kent since the 18th century. In a vivid illustration of the problems facing those who own historic houses but lack the funds to run them, he had recourse over the years to a catalogue of ingenious and desperate measures. These included ploughing up part of the ornamental garden to grow Christmas trees, and at one time turning half of the 90-room mansion into a henhouse, while the stables were given over to his pigs.

intended to convert it into retirement homes. But the plan fell through, and he bought the house back. He next proposed laying out a safari park in the grounds, in partnership with the zoo proprietor John Aspinall. This ran into local objections and planning obstacles, and Guilford, never very keen on the idea in any case, returned to the drawing board once more.

Edward Francis North was a descendant of the Lord North who was King George III's Prime Minister at the time of the American War of Independence. Tragedy soon overtook him. His father and his aunt were killed (and his mother badly injured) in 1940 by a mine which blew up on Sandwich Bay while they were out walking their dogs on a beach which was then part of the estate.

size) had been ploughed up during the war and he began work as a "hands-on" farmer, putting up fences, driving a tractor or planting trees. Despite being tall and thin, he was wiry and deceptively strong-armed. He enjoyed becoming involved in public life. He was president of the Men of Kent and Kentish Men organisation, chaired the forestry section of the Kent Agricultural Society and did much for the school for deaf children in Margate. He was made a deputy lieutenant for Kent in 1976.

thought it wrong to treat the Upper House as a mere club. His greatest pride and joy was a vintage fire engine, a silver wedding present from his wife. He used it to put out small fires on the estate and, dressed in fireman's kit, would drive it from time to time round the local villages. Perhaps it was just as well that he had it, for he was also seriously interested in fireworks. He enjoyed laying on bonfire nights on the estate and organising displays for local schools.

PETER DUFFY

Peter Duffy, QC, lawyer, died of lung cancer on March 5 aged 44. He was born on August 8, 1954.

IN A profession noted for its individualism, Peter Duffy truly stood out. In ten short years of practice, just two of them as a silk, he imposed himself on the fields of human rights and European Community law in a way that few others have ever done.

Many of his cases were of such interest and importance that they were known to the public at large. He acted for Diane Blood when the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority refused to allow her to be impregnated with her dead husband's sperm. The Court of Appeal accepted that the authority's refusal to allow her to export the sample for treatment abroad contravened the right of free movement of goods within the European Union.

His cases were often controversial. He played a leading role in the legal campaign waged by Compassion in World Farming to improve the lot of veal calves exported to other member states of the EU. In the area of sexual equality his contribution was unmatched. He argued the cases for homosexuals in the military, Smith and Perkins, the age of consent cases, Wilde and Sutherland, and the sado-masochism case, Brown.

College and at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. He had a particular interest in international and public law, which he pursued both at Cambridge and at the University of Brussels. At the latter, he obtained a licence spéciale en droit européen with a rarely awarded grade, la plus grande distinction, a source of particular pride.

He was called to the Bar in 1978 and between 1979 and 1989 he taught full-time at Queen Mary and Westfield College, becoming visiting Professor of European Law at the University of Strasbourg. In 1981, with Professor Rosalyn Higgins (later Dame Rosalyn Higgins, the British judge at the International Court of Justice), he set up a masters' course in international human rights at the London School of Economics. He wrote prodigiously and became editor of the European Human Rights Reports.

An important part of Duffy's life concerned his practical commitment to human rights. He was called on by the International Executive Committee of Amnesty International and soon became the committee chairman. He was always ready to fly to some remote part of the world, at times at some personal risk, to plead a cause which he held dear.

In 1989 he decided to try out full-time practice at the Bar. He joined Four Essex Court, which later became Essex Court Chambers. Not one to wait for work to come to him, he embarked on a policy of writing widely. He had a column in the Law Society Gazette, and he was never known to turn down an invitation to speak at a conference or seminar. Duffy proved to be a fine advocate, as his elevation to silk in just eight years demonstrated. He had a complete mastery of his subject, but many lawyers have that. What made him such a successful advocate was his ability to present the argument so persuasively that it was sometimes difficult to believe that the contrary proposition was even arguable.

The rewards and prizes of a successful practice were beginning to arrive. He was chairman of the Bar European Group. He had been appointed an assistant recorder, but died just before the news was announced. Shortly before his death he was mooted in The Times as a candidate for the Lawyer of the Year award. But these are small change compared with what might have lain ahead.

He leaves a widow, Vivienne, and three young daughters; a son predeceased him.

STANLEY JONES

Stanley Jones, literary biographer, died on March 11 aged 83. He was born on March 2, 1916.

STANLEY JONES, the leading authority on the essayist William Hazlitt, was one of the great scholar-burrowers: a finder of facts and solver of puzzles, by discovery and by inference; verifier of authorship, and scourge of false attributions. Nobody in his generation did more to extend the knowledge of a major Romantic author. His scholarly character was a compound of observance in other master archivists, of industry and modesty, enthusiasm and temperate judgment.

Readers of his biography Hazlitt: From Winterslow to Frith Street (1989) had the impression that Jones could say where Hazlitt was and what he did on every day of his life, rather more confidently than Hazlitt himself could have done. The biographer came to know of missed chances the subject only guessed at, of mixed motives the subject must have doubted anyone would ever unearth.

bridge, where he began work on a doctorate, continuing it on a bursary which took him to Paris in 1938-39. During the war he joined the Intelligence Corps and was stationed at Salisbury, where he first began to read Hazlitt seriously. As he did so, he realised that he was billeted only a stone's throw from Winterslow, where Hazlitt had done much of his writing, at the cottage he had shared with Sarah Stoddart Hazlitt and at Winterslow Hut (now the Pheasant Inn).

After the war, Jones concluded his work on Proust at McGill University in Canada, where he married his Canadian wife, Dorothea, whom he had met in Paris in 1939. They returned to England in 1946, the year in which Jones was awarded his Cambridge doctorate. In 1947 he was appointed to a lectureship at Glasgow University.

Surprisingly, he never lectured in any department of English literature. During his career in Glasgow he lectured exclusively on French literature, but his friends knew that his expertise extended much further. When a visiting lecturer of a structuralist disposition gave a shoddy paper about Joyce, Jones turned readily to the passages of Ulysses that exposed the weaknesses of his argument. Jones's colleagues in the French department soon found that his interest in Hazlitt was overtaking his work on Proust.

He was an exemplary teacher, always generous with his time to students, and he supervised graduates on a wide range of topics. He retired from the university in 1981.

Like Hazlitt he loved the theatre, food, wine, music and good company. Even during the illness of his final years, he remained convivial.

He was one of the first scholars to use all of Hazlitt's manuscripts, and he established dates for many essays and letters. His pamphlet, The Second Mrs Hazlitt: A Problem in Literary Biography (1962), was the first full discussion of the identity and family history of Hazlitt's second wife, Isabella Bridgewater, which had remained unknown for more than 150 years.

Hazlitt fell out of fashion shortly after the Second World War, and for many years Jones was one of the few scholars working on him. This meant that he was the sole repository of much otherwise unavailable information. His legacy now is widespread and anonymous, in the generous way of such scholarship. It is in the large scattering of articles that trace allusions, and debts of other kinds, that award credit and praise and, sometimes, subtract blame where it was lodged unduly by less conscientious research.

He was tremendously generous with his erudition. Despite illness, he had managed in the years since publishing his biography to uncover much new information on Hazlitt, a good deal of which remains unpublished. He laid a foundation for the revival of Hazlitt that started in the 1970s, and his research underlies Duncan Wu's nine-volume Selected Writings, of which he was an advisory editor.

Lowell Fulson, blues singer and guitarist, died on March 8 in Long Beach, California, aged 77. He was born on March 31, 1921.

THERE are few bluesmen whose careers have been as enduring and as influential as that of Lowell Fulson. A performer from the American South West, he became one of the mainstays of the postwar West Coast blues scene, where he employed Ray Charles and inspired a young B. B. King.

When Elvis Presley finished his army service and returned to the studios for his Elvis Is Back album, one of the best tracks was his version of Fulson's Reconsider Baby. And when, a decade later, the soul singers Otis Redding and Carla Thomas wanted a suitable song to perform together, they chose Fulson's Trump and enjoyed an international bestseller. Fulson himself carried on performing and recording into the 1990s, his passion and talent undiminished.

Born in the Choctaw Indian Strip in Tulsa, Oklahoma, of mixed black and native American Indian extraction, Fulson began his musical education early. "My first singing was done in churches for picnics and socials. My grandfather was a good fiddler, one of my uncles played guitar; another played mandolin." His first professional experience came with a string band before he teamed up in 1940 with the itinerant blues singer Alger "Texas" Alexander, who had recorded widely in the 1920s and 1930s. He stayed with Alexander for a year before marrying his first wife and moving to Gainesville in Texas, from where he was drafted into the Navy in 1943.

While stationed in Oakland, California, he met the record company boss Bob Geddins, who promised to record him after the war. Geddins, one of a new breed of independent record entrepreneurs who had begun to cater for the burgeoning rhythm and blues market, recorded Fulson and his brother Martin in 1946. Those early records were in a country-blues vein, but Fulson soon put a touring rhythm and blues-slanted band together, with Ray Charles as his piano player and musical director. Hits followed with records such as Black Widow Spider Blues, Every Day I Have the Blues and a number that he later gave to B. B. King, Three O'Clock in the Morning.

In 1953, while still constantly touring, he signed for the Chicago-based Chess label and enjoyed the biggest hit of his career with the moving and heartfelt Reconsider Baby, which became a blues standard. Although he stayed with Chess for several years, his light and swinging brand of West Coast blues never fitted easily into the Chess label's repertoire of tough Chicago blues, and when Fulson moved to Los Angeles in the 1960s, he signed for the West Coast Kent label. There he recorded another big hit, the laconic Trump, although its success in 1966 was eclipsed a year later by the cover version by Redding and Thomas.

He moved to the Southern label, Jewel, in the 1970s but found his hard to come by in the soul and disco era, even though he tried to update his sound with the progressive album In a Heavy Bag. However, like many other bluesmen of his era, he was able to find a new, enthusiastic — and white — audience in the 1980s and 1990s. A new recording contract with the Bullseye label and tours abroad further enhanced his reputation as an elder statesman of the blues.

His wife Sadie died in 1987. He leaves two sons and three daughters.

CARDINAL RAUL SILVA HENRIQUEZ

Cardinal Raul Silva Henriquez, former Archbishop of Santiago, died on April 9 aged 91. He was born in Santiago on September 27, 1907.

CARDINAL Silva Henriquez was an outspoken campaigner for human rights who ensured that the Roman Catholic Church in Chile was in the forefront of opposition to the military dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet. He once swore that he would shelter dissidents and opponents of Pinochet's regime under his bed, rather than hand them over to the secret police.

Raul Silva Henriquez was born in the city of Talca in 1907. He gained a law degree from the Catholic University in Santiago in 1929 and was ordained priest nine years later. He became Archbishop of Santiago in April 1962, and a year later was made a cardinal. He went on to become one of the most influential and respected Church leaders in Latin America this century.

"There are more of the Gospel's values in socialism than there are in capitalism," the Cardinal once said. Such views were reflected in the modern Chilean Church as a whole, which on social questions had long taken a more progressive line than any other Latin American Church. But Silva Henriquez firmly opposed Marxism in all its life, and was far from sharing the radical inclinations of some of the younger priests in Chile.

His rejection of all kinds of extremism, combined with some fairly sophisticated political skills, made him a natural mediator between the socialist Government of President Salvador Allende, elected in 1970, and the right-wing opposition. His efforts at promoting dialogue continued almost to the eve of the coup which overthrew Allende's chaotic regime in September 1973: the Marxist President and the Christian Democrat leader Patricio Aylwin were dining together at the Cardinal's house as late as August.

Two days after the armed coup, which brought General Pinochet to power, the Cardinal drafted a strong statement on behalf of the Chilean bishops condemning the violence of the takeover. In the subsequent months, as the full ruthlessness of the military junta became apparent, he seemed to take a less outspoken line, and was criticised by more radical priests for his caution. But the junta was always anxious to avoid a complete rupture with the Church if it could, and the Cardinal's measured approach at this time undoubtedly enabled the Chilean Church not only to survive comparatively unscathed, but to become the only tolerated and effective organised opposition to Pinochet's regime.

Not that the Church was entirely unscathed by events. Foreign priests were expelled from the country, Chilean priests found aiding the revolutionary opposition were arrested. Some were shot. And the Chilean Committee of Co-operation for Peace, set up by the Church soon after the coup to give legal aid to political prisoners and advice to people dismissed from their jobs for political reasons, was swiftly suppressed.

The Cardinal responded by establishing the Vicaria de Solidaridad. The vicariate, located in a huge colonial mansion in Santiago, became a refuge for victims of the dictatorship. Hundreds of widows of left-wing politicians and activists listed as "disappeared" stayed at the home and raised their children in it. It also provided rehabilitation for dozens of men and women who were released after months of torture in clandestine camps.

Cardinal Silva Henriquez was for many years the only recognised human rights campaigner to be allowed to visit torture victims in their cells. He toured Chile's police stations, prisons and military barracks to collect evidence of human rights abuses.

The vicariate was subjected to considerable harassment, as attempts were made to seize its incriminating files. The Cardinal and his colleagues were subjected to a thorough-going campaign of vilification and worse. Silva Henriquez received regular death threats, his parents' graves were defaced and then smashed, and shots were fired at his home.

Much of the information the vicariate had compiled was later used in the official report commissioned by the democratically elected Chilean Government at the end of the dictatorship. It included a list of 3,197 people who were killed or who disappeared at the hands of General Pinochet's secret police. The vicariate's work was recognised with the award of the Carter-Menil Human Rights Prize at the Carter Centre in Georgia in 1987.

That same year the Cardinal offered his services as mediator once again, this time between General Pinochet and his opponents. The Church's encouragement of dialogue undoubtedly helped to bring about Chile's eventual peaceful transition from military rule.

In a country — and a continent — accustomed to political polarisation and the violence it brings, Cardinal Silva Henriquez was esteemed as a symbol of dialogue and of peaceful change. When democracy in Chile was once again in sight, he refused to accept nomination as a compromise presidential candidate, as some opposition groups had hoped he might, but in his later years he had supporters from all sectors of Chilean society. As his health worsened over the past months, hundreds of leading Chilean figures visited him at the Salesian Order's home where he had spent the last years suffering from Alzheimer's.

THE ERUPTION OF VESUVIUS

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT)

NAPLES, April 11 EXCEPT for a slight renewal of activity about 9 o'clock yesterday evening, Vesuvius seems to have entered upon a period of quiet. The lava flow, as far as can be judged, is assuming more ordinary proportions and is no longer a source of danger. The rain of ashes, of hot sand, and gravel (lapilli), though considerably diminished, still continues and threatens further destruction to the villages which have borne the brunt of their fall. Ottaviano and San Giuseppe Vesuviano have suffered the most heavily in the destruction of buildings. San Giuseppe, deserted by its inhabitants, is almost buried in places by mounds of ash and gravel. Many of its houses are in ruins. At Ottaviano the municipal buildings have also fallen. The appearance of both places is indescribably wretched. Everything seems buried under a smothering weight of grey dust which represents the fallen ash, and all the air is full of ash that is still falling, so imperceptibly fine that it can hardly be distinguished by the eye, and yet so dense that one cannot see a hundred yards ahead and that even breathing is sometimes difficult.

ON THIS DAY

April 12, 1906

The eruption of Vesuvius on April 7 destroyed the town of Ottaviano. More than a hundred people were killed in Naples; for miles around the volcano, villages and towns were cut off.

On the coast line, in spite of the cessation of the lava flow, matters are hardly improved. Torre Annunziata still lies abandoned under its grey shroud, and the resources of Castellammare are taxed to the utmost to provide for refugees from the Annunziata and the neighbouring districts, who are said to number over 20,000, many of whom have escaped without food or clothing. Torre Greco is almost deserted, and great difficulty has been experienced in feeding the scanty remnants of its population left without bread or the possibility of obtaining it. I witnessed this morning a pathetic instance of the miserable confusion that reigns in the deserted towns. Two firemen, just landed from an American steamer, were in search of their families at Torre Greco. They found their homes abandoned and no sign of the whereabouts of the fugitives.

Naples is more deeply smothered in ash than ever. Yesterday evening it began once more to fall upon the city and continued until midday today. In view of possible disasters to the roofs the municipality have issued orders for its removal, but the work of removal will be enormous. I can only compare the effect to a heavy snowstorm in London. The same difficulty of progression, the same curious muffling of all sound save the occasional scraping of shovels...

The roads in Naples are horrible, but those towards Ottaviano and towards Torre Greco are almost impassable, a foot deep in the heavy dust and still encumbered with the carts of the unhappy refugees. It is impossible even to guess at the extent of the damage that has been done. The possibility of actual loss to property and to life may not be great, but one cannot exaggerate the suffering that has been inflicted, which is out of all proportion to either. The British Vice-Consul assures me that in all his 60 years' experience of Naples he has never known either a worse eruption of Vesuvius or more disastrous consequences...

Wales stage grandest finale

on the final day of 89 years of the Five Nations Championship

SPORT does not come much better, nor embrace so many twists and turns, as the last episode of rugby union's Five Nations Championship. Next year, five become six, with the addition of Italy, and they have a mighty legacy to live up to after a Sunday upon which English hopes of a grand slam with which to conclude the millennium disappeared down a Welsh mine and Scotland were left as holders of the championship for the first time since 1990.

The drama of Wales's 32-31

England may have been denied yesterday but since 1910, when France joined, they have won the most championships - 27. Wales won 26, France 20, Ireland 14 and Scotland 13.

injury-time win over England at a tumultuous Wembley enhanced in the most brilliant light possible Scotland's 36-22 victory over France in Paris on Saturday. Their five tries in an outrageous first half - one of them, from Gregor Townsend, earning the fly half a nap hand against all four championship opponents and Italy - gave them the sniff of a title that most critics believed to be beyond them in mid-season.

Yet they had to rely on their Celtic cousins from Wales to build on earlier victories over France and Italy. Indeed, Scotland had to wait until the 82nd minute of the match at Wembley before Wales took the lead, exploded theories of English omnipotence and relegated France, winners of the grand slam in 1997 and 1998, to holders of the wooden spoon in 1999.

That Scotland carried off the Five Nations trophy (first presented in 1993) for the first time only on points difference from England is neither here nor there. They have played such positive rugby this season - even against England, when they registered three tries but lost on goal kicks - and suffered such cruel luck with injuries that few could resist their claim to be the team of the season.

What a wonderful championship, sponsored by Lloyds TSB, it has been. That France have proved to be such a fading force has, certainly, detracted from the spectacle overall, but Scotland and Wales have compensated for that in full measure. New Zealand can claim some of the credit for that, through Graham Henry, the Wales coach, and a clutch of influential players - the Leslie brothers and Glenn Metcalfe for Scotland, Shane Howarth and Brett Sinton for Wales - but if they have brought a more rigorous, accurate approach from home-bred players, so much the better.

Nor could Wales's victory have come at a better time: next season, they host the fourth World Cup and will do so on the back of significant wins at senior, A, under-21 and under-19 levels this season. For all the politics that have infected the game in the Principality, there has been a resuscitation of native skills on the field.

Henry suggested last night that England might not have taken enough respect for his team on to Wembley's wide open spaces with them. "There is nothing like earning respect out on the field, it's a huge emotion," he said. That Henry believes England still to be the strongest team in the northern hemisphere is an arguable point: they will not be the best while they continue to squander scoring chances in the way that they have throughout this championship.

England did so against France and they did again yesterday. "We are shattered,"

Clive Woodward, the coach, said. "There is not a lot I can say to the players, because the tactics were right, the selections were right, but we lost the game."

Even in the moment of the Welsh victory, Jim Telfer, the Scotland coach, whose Five Nations swansong this was, remained unflustered - outwardly at least. "I rarely get emotional," Telfer said, "but when Neil Jenkins had that last kick, I was watching and saying: 'Please get one more over.'"

"It would have been better if we had won a grand slam, but this championship is almost as good as Durban [when the British Isles won the series against South Africa]. Didn't Neil Jenkins win that one as well?"

"This is one of the great days. On Saturday, we won a game; yesterday, we won a championship. It is a very good feeling. It gives us a great lift for the World Cup."

Instead of taking off for Australia in May for their World Cup camp in a cloud of euphoria, England will do so still uncertain of their true worth. Wales will tour Argentina this summer knowing that they still have a long road to travel, but believing that they have a motor in place that will drive them forward. Scotland, who visit South Africa but play no internationals, can cement their achievements in low-key circumstances for which they will be wiser when they resume in August.

As for the Five Nations itself, an 89-year-history has reached a superb conclusion. There have been many moments to savour, but few championships have matched the roller-coaster ride of this last one.

FA Cup: Newcastle United book Wembley return as captain delivers extra-time double

Shearer elbows Tottenham aside

THERE is only one team at Wembley and it seems, only one player in the country capable of scoring the goals to put them there. After two FA Cup semi-finals had been barren for a total of almost four hours yesterday, Alan Shearer stepped up to score a penalty and then, with a shot of sweet violence from outside the area, to put beyond doubt the case for Newcastle United to defeat Tottenham Hotspur.

The drama of the second semi-final had to be hauled through a long, sometimes tedious afternoon at Old Trafford, racked by organised tension and caution and, at times, streaked by malevolence. From early in the encounter, Shearer, with his elbow blatantly in the face of Mauricio Taricco, set the tone.

He was a man out of sorts with himself, bitter, it would appear, at his lack of decisive pace since he sustained his serious ankle injury last year. Mean of spirit, he had the Tottenham half of the 53,609 crowd chiding that he was a cheat. He had Sol Campbell complaining to the referee about his constant misdemeanours, and he even had the Newcastle players groaning that their captain, the England captain, seemed unwilling to throw himself into the fray with the same selfless, at times reckless disregard for the physical outcome that was coursing through the blustery, levered afternoon.

By the time that Shearer turned himself from villain to hero, the air had been blackened by the refusal of Paul Durkin, the referee, to give Tottenham a penalty when, in the 55th minute, Nicolas Dabiz rose to handle the ball from a free kick by Carr. It was — or from the stands it certainly looked — an injustice, and on such are the fortunes of the Cup won and lost. Maybe, for the first time since 1955, Newcastle are going to celebrate a victory at Wembley, whether it is over Arsenal, who denied them a year ago, or Manchester United.

Sir John Hall, now departed the inner boardroom of St James' Park, had always said that his dream was a team of Georgies. Instead, around the home boy, Shearer, who cost them £15 million, they are happy to include players from Greece, Peru, Germany and Croatia. How did they and the other foreigners, including David Ginola, Tottenham's Cup talisman, get drawn into the English passion that has Cup semi-finals running at a pace faster than the mind can control? It is a pace that takes its toll on limbs and, predictably, the first to surrender to it were those familiar injury victims, Steve Howey, for Newcastle, and Darren Anderton, for Tottenham.

Howey fell on the half-hour — a player with class stricken so often as if his tissue were made of glass. This time it appeared to be a calf injury and for Anderton, in the fifth minute, it was a hip.

With so many boots raised so high, there was also a player, Andy Sinton, kicked out of the game by a high, two-footed lunge from Andrew Griffin that should have merited more than one of the six yellow cards of this fierce combat. Indeed, cautions came more than thrills. For Tottenham, in the second minute, there had been a spectacular, dipping volley from Sherwood, fisted over the bar by Given. For Newcastle, a collection of individuals, they could claim only that Nolberto Solano should at least have hit the target when he shot low outside the near post.

So it wore on, the Tottenham supporters standing — whenever Ginola was on the ball and then slumping back into their seats when, with Robert Lee detailed to augment the smothering role on the Frenchman by Griffin, the magic would not happen.

George Graham, the Tottenham manager, has instilled an Arsenal-type stubbornness into the Worthington Cup winners, but at the price of style. Ruud Gullit is on his way to Wembley not because his Newcastle team breathed more quality or more joy into the game, but because they at least managed to overrun Tottenham through the expedient of passing and moving.

Of course, Graham's wrath was vented at officialdom. "When he [Gullit] looks back at it [the handball] by Dabizas on video he will see what a bad decision he made — one of many in my opinion," Graham said. "What was he watching? If he did watch the flight of the ball, he must have seen it go to hand. And I think if we'd got that penalty we would have won the game. Trust me on that."

The penalty that the referee did see came after 108 minutes. Shearer and then Duncan Ferguson, the substitute, who under another manager might well have replaced

Shearer himself, had each been denied by fingertip saves from Ian Walker. And then, when Speed played the ball in, when Ferguson flicked it on, it was the hand of Campbell that Durkin saw knock the ball down. Shearer sent Walker the wrong way from the penalty spot.

To crown his day, to put the final deception on this semi-final, another substitute, Silvio Maric, wonderfully turned the ball back and Shearer, yards outside the penalty box, with almost languid yet at the same time ferocious force from his right foot, guided the ball as if by radar, high and higher still, until it shot over the left shoulder of the goalkeeper and into the top corner. A Georgie, one of the few, had triumphed.

Central figure in search of new identity

Alan Shearer repels personal questions with plaudits about collective effort but, for once, he really was indebted to the service that others provide. Newcastle United, too, owe their place in the FA Cup final to one benefactor. In a lull in the first half, Sol Campbell handed a water bottle to Shearer, but no one could have guessed just how far the Tottenham defender's generosity to an England teammate would run.

His unfathomable decision to handle the ball invited Shearer to open the scoring with a penalty. Furthermore, the thrill of the breakthrough stayed with the centre forward, his exhilaration ringing out of the fiercely sliced 20-yarder with which he removed all doubts over the outcome.

Yet Shearer has still to dispel reservations about his condition. A terrible Achilles injury cost him much of last season and, since his return, his famed power has assumed a new, less decisive character. Often, his strength is now like that of a defender and it sees him wrestling with opponents rather than bursting free of them. In this semi-final,

Tottenham fans booed him for burying challenges early in the afternoon.

Ruud Gullit, the Newcastle manager, does not subscribe to the conventional view of Shearer. He sees his captain not as a dwindling resource, but as a man who has been denied his true role. For Gullit, Shearer is miscast as a target man and should, instead, be advancing on to the ball. Therefore, the manager saw the introduction of Duncan Ferguson in the 75th minute.

Kevin McCarran says that the England striker is not the player he once was his first appearance after four months of injury, as a crucial change in context.

"Whenever Duncan got a flick," Gullit said, "Alan was nearby and he could control the game. Alan has needed that for a long time. He hasn't had it since Les Ferdinand was at Newcastle."

A year ago, also at Old Trafford, Shearer had decided an FA Cup semi-final, hitting the goal, from close range, that defeated Sheffield United. In 1999, much has changed. Yesterday, there was often a tightness to exchanges and, in that period, his critics could have taken Shearer for a braver. Gullit himself has observed that the player, after so many injuries, must devise a new method of play. For that process to be completed, Shearer would need to contradict his own aggressive nature and devote more attention to scheming and playmaking.

Before the game, it had been a Tottenham Hotspur player whom many expected to shape the result, but, unable to galvanise the semi-final, David Ginola had to make do with breathing life into a cliché. Here is a figure who really does bring the crowd to its feet. Of course, there is always a clatter of op-up seats when spectators rise to watch a centre forward going through on the goalkeeper; Ginola, however, needs only to be in possession to have the same effect.

In the first half, with the ball at his feet and animation in his gait, the crowd at Old Trafford rose with an eagerness that suggested they wished to accompany him on his runs. Unfortunately for the entertainment value, others at Old Trafford had the same idea. So long as he was on the field, Ginola, who was replaced eventually, found that he could never free himself from Rob Lee and the admirable Andy Griffin.

Poyet returns for final lap

DEVOTEES of the FA Cup Premiership have long since given up paying attention to the margin of Chelsea's victories. On paper, this match may look close but, in reality, Gianluca Vialli's team dominated it — and in the manner of champions-elect, to boot.

They started the afternoon with a gentle, economic approach, as if quietly confident that this could be the week in which they take pole position in the title race. Only last month, Vialli, the player-manager, was dismissing the possibility that Chelsea could catch Arsenal and Manchester United. Now, anything seems possible.

With their two rivals in the Premiership engaged in an FA Cup semi-final replay on Wednesday, Chelsea could, if they win away to Middlesbrough, top the table. They went top just before Christmas, but to do so in April has more of an ominous ring to it for the other contenders.

"It is a massive week for us," Ray Wilkins, the first-team coach, said, "but Boro have had a mini-revival, so we have no illusions. It will be extremely tough for us up there."

For Chelsea, the script is unravelling nicely. When Gustavo Poyet was badly injured earlier in the season, Chelsea stuttered, but the fans knew that the minute Poyet returned, their team would start to storm back to full power. "It's like having a new player at the club," Wilkins said — but, in truth, Chelsea knew exactly what they were missing. The Uruguayan midfielder possesses a rare killer instinct.

He could have scored twice yesterday before Chelsea broke the deadlock in the 23rd minute, first with an overhead kick, then from a free kick by Zola, which he tried to bundle over the line. Instead, it was Flo who scored, after a meticulous move, in which the Norway striker took hold of the ball inside the centre circle and exchanged passes with Goldback before beating Sullivan effortlessly.

Chelsea continued to create chances. Zola worked a short corner with Goldback that set up Duberry for a header, which he put wide. When Petrescu picked out Zola with a cross, the Italian's blistering strike was blocked by Cunningham. Poyet put another chance wide but, by now, it looked inevitable that he would score, eventually.

He did, early in the second half, with a thundering half-volley after a cross by Zola. There was no need then for the West London side to exert themselves further; after all, the title race demands that a team paces itself and what would be the point in gloating at the extra workload facing Arsenal and Manchester United if Chelsea were to risk tiredness at Selhurst Park?

Nevertheless, Wimbledon, for all their failings yesterday, gave Chelsea a slap across the face in injury time. Gayle scoring after a cross by Ainsworth. For just a few seconds, the prospect of an unlikely draw boosted the home support; for just a few seconds, Wimbledon looked more like their old selves, rather than the petulant, slumbering side of the previous 90 minutes.

But Wimbledon have nothing much to play for now, whereas Chelsea — with a full squad possessing, according to Wilkins, astounding fitness levels — can see the summit of the mountain they have been climbing all season and snow as yet untrodden. It is indeed a massive week.

Campbell lifts Everton spirits

THE scenes which greeted Everton's first win in five matches yesterday, a victory which took them out of the bottom three in the FA Cup Premiership, were frenzied indeed. Players rushed to congratulate Kevin Campbell, the scorer of Everton's two goals, while the police were quick to provide an escort for Rob Harris, the latest referee to take centre stage.

The Oxford official saw fit to book seven players and five minutes from time, with Coventry striving might and main to force an equaliser, it appeared that one contentious decision too far could prove costly for Everton.

Darren Huckerby touched the ball past Marco Materazzi before falling to ground. If Everton escaped a penalty by a matter of inches, Materazzi did not escape his second caution, which brought dismissal. The Italian looked distraught, for Huckerby's tumble appeared somewhat theatrical.

Peversely, however, this setback spurred Everton to greater things and, with less than three minutes remaining, Campbell reacted quickest to a rebound to ensure three vital points. "Our margin for error is slight," Walter Smith, the Everton manager said, "so it was important to get our recovery back on track."

The roars from the Everton supporters mingled encouragement with emotion. These fans have more experience of relegation battles than many of the players.

Dismissing a narrow escape from a shot by Gary Breen in the first minute, positive thinking served the home side well in the first half. Ball and Dacourt peppered the Coventry goal and Nicky Barmby was foiled by an instinctive save from Hedman when he had the goal at his mercy. With 28 minutes gone, however, Barmby made amends. He toe-poked a pass to Campbell, who is on loan from Trabzonspor, and the striker escaped the attentions of Williams before rounding the goalkeeper to score.

The Coventry players were adamant that Campbell had fouled Williams in the process and it appeared that they had a good case, but if this was the stroke of luck Everton have been seeking, they singularly failed to take advantage of it.

Campbell and Francis Jeffers both wasted good openings before the second half brought a turn for the worse. Whatever Smith says to his players at half-time, he seems to have an unsettling effect. They surrendered an interval lead to lose to Sheffield Wednesday in their previous home game and it appeared something similar was about to occur as Coventry heaped pressure on an increasingly brittle defence.

Abolished twice went close, denied on the second occasion by a heroic piece of defending by Short. Williams fired a shot straight at Myhr and Sotvedt ballooned another good chance over the crossbar. The ball bounced around frantically in the Everton penalty area but Coventry were unable to apply the decisive touch.

In an encounter plagued by niggling challenges, it seemed inevitable that one player, at least, was going to be sent off. Dacourt tried in vain to clear that booby prize, although the one yellow card he picked up means that another suspension is heading his way.

Instead it was Materazzi, who received his marching orders. Against Sheffield Wednesday, his mistakes cost his club dear. Yesterday, the Gods were kinder and after two successive victories, Coventry were reminded that Nationwide League football still remains a possibility. EVERTON (13-5-2) T. Mayne — C. Short, D. FA Cup: Ferguson furious as dubious offside decision subjects his team to Villa Park replay

Extended semi riles United

Odds grow longer on treble chance

Oliver Holt, football correspondent, detects worrying signs of staleness as an epic season reaches its finale

There was finesse and there was fire at Villa Park yesterday afternoon, but both were relegated to subservience. Basic virtues triumphed in this FA Cup semi-final between the nation's two best sides and acquired a nobility of their own in the process.

There was an occasional shimmer from Dennis Bergkamp, the odd piece of vision from the Dutchman that took the breath away and one run in the dying seconds of extra time that eliminated Roy Keane and Ronny Johnsen in a couple of mesmerising shuffles and seemed as if it might be about to settle the tie. There were some clever passes from Keane, too, and a brace of dipping, curling free kicks from David Beckham and Ryan Giggs that commanded awe because of their precision and power. They were like flowers planted on barren ground.

This was a game of destructive beauty, a game where all creativity was lost. That extra-time run by Bergkamp was stifled by a lunging tackle from Gary Neville. Giggs's free kick was clutched by David Seaman and a late break by Fredrik Ljungberg foundered on the excellence of Peter Schmeichel.

The one time that the ball did bulge the net, dispatched there by a fierce half-volley from Keane in the 39th minute, it was ruled out by a dubious offside decision that penalised Dwight Yorke, even though he was clearly not seeking to interfere with play.

Alex Ferguson, the United manager, described the decision — which provoked fury among the United players — as "absolutely ridiculous". Keane explained why it angered his side so much. "We knew how tight it was going to be," he said. "We knew there was only ever going to be one goal in it. That's why we were so disappointed."

More than anything, this was a game that relied on the apparently ageless excellence of the Arsenal defence for its inspiration. They were utterly unbreachable yesterday, neutralising Yorke and Andy Cole and reducing Beckham and Giggs to peripheral figures. At the heart of that defence,

Hand-to-hand existence: Dixon, the Arsenal full back, gets to grips with Keane as Manchester United go on the attack at Villa Park yesterday a back four that has conceded only 13 goals in the FA Cup Premier League this season. Tony Adams and Martin Keown played as well as they have done all year. Keown, in particular, was unyielding in the challenge, impossible to beat.

On the rare occasion that United had half an opening, when they might have won one challenge in the opposing penalty area, Arsenal invariably won the second. If Adams was beaten, Keown was there to mop up, and vice versa. More often, they broke up play with a thudding tackle or a neat intervention. To make United's attacking task even harder, Patrick Vieira and Nelson Vivas worked away like demons in front of the defence, stopping their opponents from running directly at Adams and Keown. They were a formidable barrier.

Even when Vivas was sent off five minutes into the first period of extra time, earning his second yellow card for elbowing Nicky Butt in the face, Arsenal breathed hard, regrouped and returned to the task. Only two minutes from the end, when Adams collided with Nigel Winterburn, did United have a clear opportunity, and Yorke dragged his shot wide from ten yards.

That, in fact, was the game in microcosm. With Arsenal playing conservatively, looking to hit United on the break, the onus was on Ferguson's side to break them down. To do that, their forwards needed to be on top form, their finishing at its most clinical, but Cole and Yorke fell short of the performances that have made them such a feared partnership.

Indeed, it was Arsenal who forced the few half-chances there were before the interval. Schmeichel had to arch his back to tip over a fierce header from Adams in the 25th minute and, ten minutes later, the Danish goalkeeper flung himself to his right to push out Bergkamp's shot after it had flown at him through a crowd of players.

On the stroke of half-time, Yorke shot weakly and straight at Seaman after an exchange of passes with Cole. Then, after the break, Cole failed to convert an enticing cross from Gary Neville and, soon afterwards, struck a tame shot into the arms of Seaman after Giggs had released him in the centre.

Nicolas Anelka, who had a subdued game, wasted a chance to break the stalemate three minutes from the end of normal time when he wriggled past Jaap Stam for the first time, but he sliced his shot high and wide.

Both sides tired in the second period of extra time and the chances came in a flash flood as the game ebbed away. None of them were taken, leaving Ferguson, in particular, to rue his side's profligacy.

"There was not much between the two sides," he said. "I think it was a predictable result, to be honest with you. We had enough chances to kill them off. We created more than them but we did not take them and that is why we have to go to a replay."

It will take a mistake or a moment of brilliance to separate these sides on Wednesday. Yesterday, neither was forthcoming.

Keane and Yorke lead United's protests over the disallowed goal

Adams presents indestructible barricade

Matt Dickinson says the boys of the old brigade who constitute Arsenal's defence continue to amaze by their resilience

If Tony Adams is the Doctor of Defence, as his manager claims, then yesterday he allowed the rest of us a glance at his thesis. The Arsenal captain has produced some immense performances for club and country over more than a decade, but few can have equalled this colossal display. Some of his tackles would have stopped the traffic.

He must have been that good to have narrowly pipped Martin Keown to this observer's man-of-the-match award. With some justification, Keown has complained recently that he has not been recognised as a defender of international calibre. So here goes, Martin, you are a great defender but Tony, I am afraid, is still that little bit better.

In tandem, and with Nigel Winterburn, Lee Dixon and David Seaman in their own resolute mood, the safest bet yesterday was that not even the country's most prolific attack would be capable of breaching England's most steadfast defence. The reduction to ten men, when Nelson Vivas was rightly dismissed four minutes into extra time, only made Arsenal's stubbornness more certain. The resilience is in the blood.

Adams threw himself into tackles with an enthusiasm that belied his 32 years and dodgy ankles, as well as embarking on the odd rampage upfield. At one point in the first half, he charged forward with such unlikely speed that he appeared to have got on the end of his own clearances and he, more than anyone, did not deserve to lose this game.

There have been times this season when the pain in his legs has prompted talk of retirement and he will prove irreplaceable when the day eventually comes. They will clear the marble halls of Highbury for another bronze bust.

With Patrick Vieira and Roy Keane

matching each other in magnificence in midfield and both attacks sporadic in their effectiveness, this was the sixth meeting in succession in which United have found themselves unable to overcome their sternest rivals. It is a run of four defeats and two draws that stretches back to February 1997 and, in the minds of the United players, the little doubts must have started to become self-fulfilling. Dwight Yorke and Andy Cole must feel as though they are banging their heads, as well as their shots, against a brick wall.

Arsenal will certainly have left Villa Park in the jauntier mood. Without the burden of a European campaign to distract them, they will feel that the return of Emmanuel Petit from his three-match suspension for the replay on Wednesday will give them a slight edge.

They appeared less willing than United to gamble on throwing bodies forward yesterday, but the Frenchman's versatility will allow them to do so in greater numbers. Perhaps by Wednesday, Nicolas Anelka will have been taught the rules of offside. And, of course, there will still be that back four to protect David Seaman, provided that they have all recovered from the aches and pains that prove more reluctant to depart by the year. Winterburn, 35, was bleeding from his chest early on after a strong challenge from Beckham and finished extra time clutching his toes as cramp set in.

Meanwhile, Dixon, 35, could barely muster the energy to clear the ball past the halfway line. It was left to Keown and Adams to carry them through, a task they performed with remarkable calm as well as courage.

"They are tough, they are intelligent and they will recover for Wednesday," Arsène Wenger, the Arsenal manager, said. "They will make it. They have made it before. We had our usual resilience and organisation and we needed the brilliance at the back. We are still in the FA Cup because of our defence." He could not have put it better.

George Cauley

but Liverpool have been guilty of questionable judgment as well as dubious taste in recent weeks. For just the third time since the 1960s, an Anfield side is unlikely to qualify for European competition and seldom has a season tailed away with such muted embarrassment as this.

Robbie Fowler's indiscretions, featuring use of buttocks and nose, have merely put those failings into sharper focus, while a lack of good grace fingers about the club like an unpleasant odour. "This season has not been good enough," Gérard Houllier, the Liverpool manager, said yesterday. "We are all playing for our futures and we can do far better."

Attempting a reversal of fortunes will not be straightforward against a Leeds United team chasing their eighth successive victory and who have David Batty and Alf Inge Haaland back to reinforce a youthful squad. THE unlikely hero is as much a part of the fabric of cup tradition as the embarrassing suits that (dis)grace the pre-match pitch inspection before every final. So, few players are better made-to-measure for the role than Regi Blinker.

The Dutchman passed the stage of vilification with Celtic supporters long ago, slipping into something more charitably described as being patronised. The Scottish Cup semi-final, therefore, simply yearned to be his stage and Blinker cast off his clown's outfit to unravel Dundee United's dreams.

Blinker's fearsome 29th-minute shot paved the way for victory at Ibrox, but the normally-sloofy Holland player then embellished his display with hitherto unknown passages of crisp passing and tackling that earned him the man-of-the-match award and, more importantly, a standing ovation from those supporters clad in green-and-white.

Blinker's day in the sun went some way to atoning for the moment of trepidation last August in the Champions' League qualifying tie with Croatia Zagreb, when he stopped in his tracks, rather than take a thump from the goalkeeper that was as certain as the goal that also beckoned. Exit from Europe seemed certain to be followed by Blinker's own Parkhead.

When Blinker arrived from Sheffield Wednesday 21 months ago, a dazzling entertainer was promised. What Celtic supporters got was the Emperor's clothes. Will one performance alter that opinion? Craig Burley believes his colleague could be back in fashion.

"I think Regi now understands that he has to work as hard as every player," the Celtic midfielder reflected. "He did not shirk any responsibility out there today and he has come back to the team, after a spell out, a different man."

It gives the Celtic forwards, Henrik Larsson and Mark Viduka, better service, too. Toshi McKinlay, the Celtic wing back, even at 34, still leaves Blinker in the shade when it comes to quality of crossing. Viduka ought to have profited on at least two occasions from McKinlay's fine work but, eventually, the Australia forward punished some negligent marking by Siggi Jonsson, the Dundee United defender, to drive in the crucial second goal.

United, swamped in the first half, rediscovered their vigour in the second in a disappointing display that Paul Sturrock, the manager, termed "Jekyll and Hyde" but of which Billy Dodds, the striker, was more damning. "We switched off after ten minutes and I can't stomach that," the Scotland midfielder player said.

Nobody would agree more than Burley. He had to suffer the unedifying sight, as he ate his pre-match meal, of his blunder when playing for Chelsea in the 1995 FA Cup semi-final, which gifted David Beckham, of Manchester United, a goal.

Blinker is right to savour the moment. The lifespan of unlikely cup heroes is a short one. Ask Mike Trebilcock, Roger Osborne or even Joe Miller. The Dundee United winger, whose runs were thwarted all day by Blinker, attracted scarcely a glance from the same Celtic fans who celebrated his winning goal in the 1989 Scottish Cup final. What a fickle game this is.

FA Carling Premiership: Villa take advantage of depleted opponents

SOUTHAMPTON 0

by Alyson Rudd

THE grouse is shot, it lies still, waiting for the danger to pass, stunned but not hurt. The man with the rifle then sees the flag indicating that the grouse season is at an end. He pauses, sidles up to the flag-bearer, thinks and then strolls up to the bird and shoots it dead.

It is an emotive analogy but then these are emotive times. The referee at Villa Park, Neale Barry, saw Claus Lundekvam pull back Ian Taylor and took his cards out of his pocket. The Southampton defender had already been cautioned, so his team-mates gathered round and pointed to the assistant referee, who had raised his flag for offside. Barry duly consulted with his assistant and awarded Southampton a free kick. The danger seemed to have passed, the Southampton players visibly relaxed. And then Barry showed Lundekvam a red card.

His decision altered the game, not least because David Jones's team are simply not the sort that play better when down to ten men. Southampton generally demean themselves on their travels — this was their eighth successive away defeat — and they were already a goal behind at the time of Lundekvam's dismissal. Mark Draper having eluded Marsden's lunging tackle to score his first FA Carling Premiership goal of the season. Yet Villa still seemed sufficiently vulnerable for Southampton to make their mark.

However, as soon as Lundekvam left the pitch in the fortieth minute it all fell apart. Jones urged Le Tissier to assume the lone striker's role but this was not such a wonderful idea. Le Tissier, having passed the ball around blithely, as is his wont, now found himself surrounded by defenders and he never was the sort to turn and run through the pack. Jones had lost not only a centre half, but also his most creative force.

The resulting collapse was pitiful and Villa, having failed to register a victory in ten matches, could scarcely contain their glee. John Gregory could even throw on Paul Merson, safe in the knowledge that this had become the sort of contest in which even a man with nagging personal problems could excel. Villa, harangued for their fall from grace, could find their groove again. Steve Stone, who, since his £5 million move from Nottingham Forest, had been a disappointment, revelled in the space offered him. Merson set up Villa's second goal and Stone the third. A delightfully weighted chip by the former Arsenal and Middlesbrough forward gave Joachim time to job the goalkeeper. Stone's efforts were eventually rewarded when Dublin headed in a perfect cross.

Gregory, possibly embarrassed by the whole affair, sent in his first-team coach Steve Harrison to face the press. "Irrespective of the circumstances, we played some good football," he insisted.

Southampton's failure to impress this season is a puzzle. There was real anticipation that this time they would avoid the relegation scrap. The reason for the optimism was the pedigree of their forward line but pedigree has counted for little. Mark Hughes has failed to score all season and Egil Ostenstad, who was perhaps not fully fit, was lumbering and awkward and wasted some good chances.

"We've got to find an away win from somewhere," Jones said. But with Villa so short of confidence, that win should have arrived on Saturday.

Lightweight Charlton lack consistent punch

MIDDLESBROUGH'S season has gone flat, but Bryan Robson might find satisfaction in the stillness. In each of his previous years as a manager there has always been a ghastly effervescence, with the club in a panic over relegation or clawing for promotion. Now, they can go placidly about the business of making other teams screech with fear and anxious hope.

Robson's side are still to play the three contenders for the FA Carling Premiership title at home, with Chelsea arriving on Wednesday, Manchester United and Arsenal may also regard Middlesbrough as a likely impediment to progress in the championship.

Sport is supposed to stired nerves, but spells of tranquillity have their charm. Middlesbrough are reviving and another portion of last year was served to a contented crowd. The supporters will particularly have relished the little mobility of Hamilton Ricard, whose eruption of goals, with five in his past five appearances, explains the team's rise in recent weeks.

He gave Middlesbrough the lead over Charlton Athletic when he collected Brian Deane's header, shot against Richard Ricks and volleyed home the rebound. In the second half, Ricard took Robbie Mustoe's pass, paced to let his team-mate make his run and then returned the ball to the midfielder player, who notched the match's second goal with a sly kick.

The visitors could not intervene to halt that move and, for much of the time, were barely present. It was only late in the afternoon, when Carl Tiler's header compelled Mark Schwarzer to make a good save, that Charlton registered. Yet, Alan Curbishley's team should have been making a boisterous, unholy spectacle of themselves.

How else is the club to stay in the Premiership? The self-effacing nature of this display was a puzzle, given that they had beaten West Ham at Upton Park only last Monday. Curbishley claimed that some of his players were still fired from the exertions of that victory and with four of their six remaining matches at The Valley, the team should soon find the will to start throwing punches again. The prize is great, since Charlton have a chance to alter their very status in football.

Curbishley believes that those who survive to contest a second season in the top flight and use the Premiership income to buy a batch of better players will then have a great advantage over the clubs that are promoted in subsequent years. The Charlton manager gives Derby County, Leicester City and Middlesbrough as shining examples of consolidation.

All the same, Curbishley is careful not to take the comparison too far. Steve Gibson, the Middlesbrough chairman, may give Robson £30 million to spend in the transfer market this summer. That is one piece of strategy Charlton will never be able to emulate.

Wright resurfaces to find little changed

FOR those obsessed with the crazy world of football finances, it must have felt like being one of the passengers who stumbled from the wreckage of The Last Train on television in the week, unaware that they had been in a state of suspended animation for 14 years: when it was not so much the big things that made them realise that something was not quite right — such as the fact that the world's population had all but been wiped out — but the small, like the absence of one last inspector lurking in the station rubble to check their tickets. Now that is really spooky.

So it was in the summer, when Manchester United's decision to pay more than £12 million for Dwight Yorke was less a barometer of an irreversibly inflated transfer market than the description in some quarters of the £700,000 fee that took Ian Wright to West Ham United as "nominal". A "nominal" three quarters of a million pounds? What would Alf Common, the first player to command a four-figure fee, have made of that?

So it was too at Filbert Street on Saturday, when an absence of goals rather than a glut of them enhanced the value of a match-winner instead of diminishing it.

That the best of several clear chances should fall to Wright, and be fluffed by him, seemed somehow inevitable. Forty-five minutes of reserve-team football after three months out with knee trouble have not been enough to sharpen his instincts and when Berkovic and Lampard combined neatly to present him with a clear opportunity 12 yards out, the West Ham substitute's third touch of the game had already sent the ball towards the seats behind Kasey Keller even before the Leicester City goalkeeper stretched to make certain with a fingertip save.

Having persuaded Wimbledon to pay £7 million for John Hartson — the awful truth of their predicament laid down on the train survivors when they find out about that bit of business — Harry Redknapp, the West Ham manager, would no doubt reflect that he has had the best of the deals. "Ian has still got what it takes to play Premiership football," Redknapp told the doubters. "He has lost none of his enthusiasm for the game."

But it is their own lack of firepower as much as Uefa's interference that has turned a highly promising season into an undignified scramble for an Inter-Toto Cup place. When Wright was hurt he was comfortably West Ham's leading scorer, with seven. Fourteen matches later he still is. They started the day as the fifth best team in the country, yet with a goal difference of minus six.

They ended it regretting not only Wright's miss but also an earlier one by Lampard when one-on-one with Keller. Shaka Hislop, Keller's opposite number, was in top form, too, and needed to be as Leicester created the bulk of the openings, although not the best ones. Goalless yes, soulless no. But it is never quite as good without them.

Van Hooijdonk lucky to miss Barber's cut

MOMENTS before the main protagonists took the field, Rammy, the Derby County mascot, hurtled over to the Nottingham Forest supporters, gesticulating wildly. The visiting supporters were ready for a dust-up with this half-man-half-ram, before he picked out a young lad in the crowd and invited him on to the pitch. The odd couple, both armed in their respective clubs' replica shirt, then proceeded to kick the ball to each other. Back and forth it went, without much care and attention, and so the afternoon continued unabated until shortly before 5pm.

Perhaps that explained, therefore, the decision of Horacio Carbonari, the Derby defender, selfishly to keep hold of the ball late in the game. It was an inspired one, as he weaved his way past Edwards and Cheltie before passing the ball into the net for the home side's winning goal. The moment was a conspicuous one, contrasting vividly with the previous 84 minutes of futile FA Carling Premiership football.

In fact, if Rammy's gesture with the young Forest fan was aimed at enhancing harmony between the two East Midlands rivals, it was the only thing that was not plagiarised by the players. They were tetchy and full of contempt, sometimes for members of their own team. The refereeing of Graham Barber added spice, too, for he made six unnecessary bookings in the first half. Russell Hoult, the Derby goalkeeper, and Richard Gough, of Forest, were also sent off by Barber, yet he ignored the juiciest incident.

Eleven minutes had gone when Pierre van Hooijdonk, the Forest striker, clashed with Vassilis Borbokis, the Derby midfielder player. Borbokis was taken off on a stretcher to hospital, where it was revealed he had fractured a cheekbone. He will not play again this season, although Van Hooijdonk's fate is less clear. He clearly caught Borbokis in the face with his elbow and the pundits on Match of the Day were unanimous in denouncing Hooijdonk as the culprit, but others were not so sure his action was premeditated.

Ron Atkinson, the Forest manager, said that the incident did not look "too clever", and that he would watch a replay of it again before deciding whether to take disciplinary action. However, he then said: "The referee did not give a free kick, and he was booking people and getting their addresses out there. Was it deliberate?"

Jim Smith, the Derby manager, was even more supportive of Van Hooijdonk. "I think it looked worse than it actually was," Smith said. The Football Association yesterday maintained that it would wait to see whether the incident was noted by Barber in his report.

Van Hooijdonk may be innocent of this crime, but he is guilty of acting like a baby and sometimes playing badly. On Saturday, he managed both: after 75 minutes of unimpressive work, he was substituted and trudged off down the tunnel before making an early exit from the ground alone.

NATIONWIDE LEAGUE: PROMOTION RIVALS JOSTLE FOR POSITION IN THE WAKE OF FIRST DIVISION LEADERS

Old rivals keep their pride intact

Norwich City ..... 0
Ipswich Town ..... 0

BY RUSSELL KEMPSON

TO THE theme of "Shake Hands on Derby Day", Norwich City and Ipswich Town prepared thoroughly for the second of their annual East Anglian get-togethers. A mood of mutual friendship was fostered during the build-up, with the managers meeting publicly for tea, biscuits and good PR, and the players exchanged greetings before kick-off at Carrow Road yesterday.

Battle then commenced, in which the niceties and bonhomie of the previous week were instantly forgotten. It was a raw, full-blooded encounter, with many challenges on the limit of legality, and was concluded in an honourable draw. Neither set of supporters, who hurled insults at each other for much of the game, should claim bragging rights this morning.

Those in the yellow and green will still do so, courtesy of their 1-0 victory at Portman Road in October, but that will mean little should Ipswich secure the second automatic promotion place in the Nationwide League first division and return to the FA Cup Premier League after a four-year absence. The point gained on hostile turf pushed them back ahead of Bradford City in the pursuit of Sunderland, the leaders.

Apart from the essentially admirable self-control of the players, much of the credit for keeping the lid on a frequently fractious affair should go to Paul Taylor, the referee. He officiated with common sense, allowed the proceedings to flow whenever possible, and adopted an even-handed attitude rather than the arrogant posturing of some of his peers. The three cautions — Carey, Jackson and Bellamy, all of Norwich — were justified.

Unfortunately, Taylor erred in the fourth minute, when he stopped play for a foul by Jackson on Johnson. Had he waited just a fraction of a second and applied the advantage rule, he would have seen Stockwell collect the loose ball and run through on his own with only Green to beat.

The ref apologised to me at half-time, "George Burley, the

Ipswich manager, said. "He made a mistake. That's the way it goes sometimes."

Norwich made the brighter start but became increasingly indebted to Robert Green, 19, the goalkeeper, who was making his debut in place of the suspended Andy Marshall. He saved well from Johnson, twice, and tipped over a downward header from Johnson in the final minute that could have settled the outcome.

Inadvertently, Green also contributed to the premature exit of Jackson, his captain, when they clashed heads while in pursuit of the ball. Jackson was carried off on a stretcher, his nose splattered, but Green carried on.

Scowcroft wasted Ipswich's best chance in the first half, heading weakly at Green from Magilton's free kick, and Stockwell should also have done better when faced by the substantial yet solitary figure of Green. Norwich threatened only rarely and Ipswich's 25th clean sheet of the season was inevitable.

Burley has yet to win a derby at Carrow Road in five years and Ipswich have not won in Norfolk since December 1992, but the wider objective — to avoid defeat — had been achieved.

"The game was always going to be fiercely contested,"

Burley said. "I was disappointed not to win. At times, we looked like the home side. Still, we're back in second place and the others have all got to catch us."

Watford respond to Taylor's urging

Watford ..... 2
Bolton Wanderers ..... 0

BY PETER ROBINSON

IT WAS not so much what he said as the fact that he was able to say anything at all. His voice was hoarse, roughened by an afternoon of furious activity on the touchline, his bellowing sometimes audible above the din of the crowd. He looked exhausted, elated and relieved — and there was a twinkle in his eye.

"It has been made very clear to the players what an opportunity this is," he said. "Why be frightened of it? It may not come next season, so you have to take it when it is there."

And what an opportunity, not merely to play in the FA Cup Premier League, but to make one or two old acquaintances eat their words. Words such as turnip. That hurt, no matter how much you may laugh it off now, because it was unexpected, unfair, and because it was personal.

Graham Taylor has had years to get over that, but he has not forgotten it, nobody has, it remains an abiding image of his time as England manager. Lesser men would have been broken by it but on Saturday, there was Taylor, manager again of his beloved Watford, discussing the possibility of taking his team, in its first season in the Nationwide League first division, back among the elite via the play-offs.

Their third win in a row has given them a glimpse of glory. Bolton Wanderers were hammered, no question. But for the heroics of Steve Banks in goal they would have been five goals down at half-time, one save from Tommy Mooney, in particular, reviving memories of his great namesake, Gordon, foiling Pele.

He saved a penalty, too, after just two minutes. Mooney again his victim. It took 23 minutes for Michal Hyde to break the deadlock and even Banks could do nothing to stop his 25-yard half-volley from reaching the top corner.

When Mooney scored at last, with a 52nd-minute header, the game was up for Bolton. They tested Chamberlain a couple of times but the Watford goalkeeper passed with flying colours. They were sluggish, almost morose, in contrast to Watford who ran like men demented — fearful, perhaps, of a rollicking from the tubby chap jumping up and down near the substitutes' bench.

"There are no signs of nerves from my players," Peter Reid, the Sunderland manager, said. "They just keep rolling out the results. We know it's not going to be easy at Bury and they haven't got the best pitch in the world, but when these games come up, we seem to have what it takes."

Francis has sights set on higher ground

Swindon Town ..... 0
Birmingham City ..... 1

BY RUSSELL KEMPSON

ALL the portents suggested a feast of goals. Glenn Hoddle, the former Swindon Town manager and England coach, enthused in the match programme about Swindon's remarkable 6-4 win against Birmingham City in April 1993: the County Ground had witnessed more goals, 77, than any other venue in the FA Cup Premier League or Nationwide League this season; and the Swindon defence had been breached 21 times in their past seven matches.

Predictably, the opposite prevailed. Swindon and Birmingham huffed and puffed for 82 minutes, before producing a solitary score. Gary Rowett jumped alone at the far post, met Martin Grainger's free kick and beat Frank Talia with a header.

Amid the weekend's sporting extravaganza — FA Cup semi-finals, Grand National, Masters, Brazilian Grand Prix, Five Nations rugby, Naseam Hamed bout — the result held little significance. Birmingham won the right to take part in the end-of-season play-offs for first division and Swindon confirmed that they should escape relegation.

On a parochial scale, it meant a lot. Birmingham have laboured in the shadows of Aston Villa and perhaps now they are ready to play alongside them in the Premiership. The Easter blip of one point from a possible six had been erased from the memory and they were back on track for the big time.

"Second place and the automatic promotion place is probably beyond us but we're getting better and better," Trevor Francis, the Birmingham manager, said. "We've been consistent and I'm very pleased with our progress."

The blip — a 0-0 draw away to Crewe Alexandra and a 2-1 home defeat against Watford — had caused consternation in the blue half of England's second city. "It's always the same," Francis said. "One defeat and the club is in crisis."

Watson struck a post and Onuora and Howe were narrowly off target as the game sprung to life, with Swindon pressing forward in the closing 15 minutes of the first half. Birmingham, resolute and reorganised after the retirement of Johnson at half-time, with a hamstring injury, bided their time.

Sharpe finish allows Jewell to launch charm offensive

Bradford City ..... 2
Portsmouth ..... 1

BY MARTIN WOODS

THE fingernail stock plummeted once more around Valley Parade as Paul Jewell's promotion-chasing team were forced to withstand a second-half siege by Portsmouth, who had fallen behind to what Alan Ball, their spin-doctor-manager, called two flukes.

That the Bradford City man of the match was Ashley Westwood, the centre half, spoke volumes for the balance of power in the second period, but Westwood's manager also displayed laser-sharp defensive qualities when dismissing Ball's fluke-goals theory.

"I hope, over the next five games, we win by two flukes as well," Jewell, a man who identifies with Gary Player's golfing maxim that the more he practised the luckier he got, said.

It is already understood among the City supporters that this final sequence of games carries a health warning. The West Yorkshire derby against Huddersfield Town, on Saturday, and the final game of the season, away to Wolverhampton Wanderers on May 9, will, no doubt, age the average City fan by ten years. A small price to pay, they reckon, to return to the top flight for the first time in 77 years.

On Saturday, it was the City players who most resembled addicts waking up and setting about getting their first fix of the day. Without it, in City's case a goal, they are rather shambling. It arrived after 25 minutes — Lee Sharpe the artistic creator, Lee Mills the executioner. Sharpe, despite his recent history of injury and enforced idleness, remains a thoroughbred and his signing, on loan until the end of the season, may yet prove Jewell's masterstroke. For his liaison with Peter Beagrie promised much and delivered a goal. McCall found Beagrie on the left touchline. He delivered a sumptuous cross to Sharpe inside the box and his header sailed past Knight.

After the break, City fell into their baffling role-playing mode of a side on the verge of a breakdown. Portsmouth took advantage and pulled a goal back after 67 minutes through Durnin.

"Another disappointing performance — another victory," Jewell said. "We're not second in the league after 41 games by being fluky."

Sunderland prepare to flush away lingering doubts

Sunderland ..... 2
Huddersfield Town ..... 0

BY GEORGE CAULKIN

THE claim has not been tested yet, but it will. That the sewage system at the Stadium of Light is capable of flushing away 42,500 pints of liquid over the course of half-time seems an impressive statistic, until the consequences of Sunderland's next home game are considered. Something to celebrate, as they surely must, a crowd in excess of 41,000 and suddenly that lavatorial capacity may appear a little fragile.

Those who did not wear Wellington boots on Saturday have gained a valuable lesson well in advance of Sheffield United's visit in 12 days time. The blessed relief paved by the supporters, the players, an entire club geared towards a higher calling, is of a related nature: the closer they inch towards their inevitable promotion, the longer their remaining journey seems to stretch in front of them.

The floodgates might already have opened if Portsmouth had won away to Bradford City on Saturday, but finally, thankfully, tomorrow night may bring an end to the misery of suspended animation. Victory away to Bury would confirm Sunderland's return to the FA Cup Premier League after two years. The wait has been interminable.

"We're just desperate to crawl over that winning line now," Niall Quinn, a keen racing man, said. Quinn, who, having won £2,500 for a local charity and a few bob for himself by backing the Grand National winner, knows a little about one-horse races. "Every time I've played against Bury it has been a tough game, but hopefully we can do enough to scrape through." Certainly, one would not dare to bet against it.

Quinn opened the scoring in this ordinary affair, courtesy of a diagonal through-ball delivered by the outstanding

Lee Clark, taken on his chest and flicked towards the target. Nico Vasson, the Huddersfield Town goalkeeper, managed to get a touch, but it was insufficient to prevent the shot trickling over the line.

On another day, Kevin Phillips might have finished with the match ball, but on this occasion had to be content with his role in Sunderland's second goal, shielding a cross from Nicky Summerbee into the path of Allan Johnston, who volleyed from 18 yards in the 41st minute. The rest was played out on autopilot.

Taylor's team-talk aids Orient cause

Cardiff City ..... 1

BY NICK SZCZEPANIK

AN inconclusive result on a day of similar outcomes at the top of the Nationwide League third division: Cardiff City remain in the automatic promotion positions, while Leyton Orient maintain their place among the play-off contenders. In anything, Orient can breathe a little easier thanks to the defeat of Plymouth Argyle at home to Brighton.

At least it turned out to be an eventful game after an unpromising opening half-hour when Cardiff's only attacking idea, a long ball in the general direction of John Williams, was one idea more than Orient had. Cardiff began to show their quality, however, and took the lead four minutes before half-time when Williams capitalised on a rebound from his own header.

Whatever Tommy Taylor, the Orient manager, said during the interval clearly roused his team — to the extent that he mused afterwards on the possibility of giving half-time talks before kick-off to future — and Lockwood's inswinging corner, headed in off his own crossbar by Eckhardt in the fifteenth minute, made a game of it.

The visiting team continued to play the better football and Williams set up an excellent chance that Carpenter wasted, but Orient nearly snatched it. Halworth parried Watts's shot at point-blank range, deservingly his luck when the ricochet off Baker bounced into his arms instead of the gaping goal: Taylor conceded that it would have been an injustice had Cardiff lost.

"We had more possession, but never used it," Frank Burrows, the Cardiff manager, said. "Teams are not going to lie down. Every game is going to be a cup final."

LEYTON ORIENT (3-5-2): S. Barnett — M. Joseph, D. Smith, S. Clark — A. Richards, W. Walters (sub: S. Carham, 68), M. Lino (sub: M. Joseph, 73), M. Lockwood — S. Watts, C. Marshall (sub: J. ## Not Bad, but no Thriller

Wigan Athletic ..... 0

BY BILL EDGAR

THE Fulham juggernaut has become unstoppable. Made roadworthy by Mohamed Al Fayed and driven single-mindedly by Kevin Keegan, it showed on Saturday that it can even take a diversion into a carnival procession without losing momentum. The parading of Michael Jackson before kick-off might have distracted other teams, but not Fulham.

The club's ability for self-promotion will be matched by promotion from the Nationwide League second division if Gillingham are beaten at home tomorrow.

Had he known of West Ham United's association with bubbles, Jackson might have chosen instead to watch them in honour of his pet chimpanzee. As it was, the Craven Cottage turf had the privilege of supporting the most famous feet in pop music, Fulham's owner having invited his friend to the game after showing him around Harrods earlier in the day.

Keegan, the Fulham chief operating officer, joined in the fun when it was suggested that some onlookers felt the special guest could have been a look-alike. "There are plenty of them that you can hire in London," he joked. Keegan added that Jackson, who wore a black, wide-brimmed tribal hat, was attracted to a picture on the wall that showed a Fulham team from the 1920s. "He was fascinated because they all had hats on like his."

Jackson's appearance was such a closely guarded secret that there was even scepticism about his authenticity on Al Fayed's own London-based radio station, Liberty, which, unhindered by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, carries commentary on all Fulham's games. If Jackson's presence was incongruous, then Fulham are equally out of place in the second division. An utterly inevitable thirteenth consecutive home win was secured by second-half goals from two international defenders, Philippe Albert and Kit Symons.

The occasion appeared to induce stage fright in the visitors. Wigan Athletic have never won a league game in front of any five-figure attendance, let alone one containing a superstar. Liddell did hit a post early on, but his side lacked attacking ambition against a Fulham team that ground out victory without producing its familiar sparkle.

The home match against Preston North End should be Fulham's last at this level, and a familiar name will be there to see them off to the first division. One of Preston's regular defenders is named Michael Jackson.

MOTOR RACING: McLAREN MERCEDES OF WORLD

ST FOR OPPOSITION IN BRAZIL

Hakkinen drives home advantage

FROM KEVIN EASON
IN SAO PAULO

JUST for a few magical minutes, it seemed that the world champion would show enough frailty to allow Formula One to revel in romance. Only the grumblings that have afflicted his McLaren Mercedes seemed able to prevent Mika Hakkinen from claiming victory in the Brazilian Grand Prix yesterday. He had swept around the Interlagos circuit over the past three days at a pace so clearly beyond his rivals that the 72 laps of the grand prix seemed mere formality.

But in Formula One, winning is never a formality and on the starting grid was a man with the willpower of Brazil behind him: Rubens Barrichello, successor to Ayrton Senna, the three-times champion. However, this world champion refused to be denied a tenth career victory. Behind him came Michael Schumacher, his Ferrari still not on terms with the speed of the McLaren, while Heinz-Harald Frentzen achieved an impressive second podium in his first two races for Jordan.

Eddie Irvine lived up to his promise of consistency, driving a steady and unremarkable race to fifth, enough to remain championship leader and keep Ferrari ahead of McLaren Mercedes in the constructors' table.

David Coulthard and Hakkinen had spent the weekend fretting that they might suffer more of the technical glitches that had put them out of the first grand prix of the season in Australia and their fears were to be realised as soon as the lights went out.

Coulthard's right arm shot into the air to signal he had stalled, a red tide of Ferrari sweeping past him to give chase to Hakkinen and Barrichello. Frentzen also burst past the Jordan Mugen Honda of Damon Hill, his teammate, who was to suffer another disastrous day after his first-lap exit in Australia.

As mechanics hurriedly pushed Coulthard's car back to the pits, Hakkinen appeared ready to stamp the authority on the race, drawing rapidly away from Barrichello and the rest of the field to a near two-second lead within three laps. Then, as the world champion passed the pit exit for the fourth time, he inexplicably cut off the power and Barrichello tore past to lead a race for the first time for Stewart Ford. Hakkinen, meanwhile, was forced to slot into third place behind Michael Schumacher, his old adversary, and the one driver he did not want to follow.

It was a moment of ecstasy for the Brazilian fans, who have been galvanised by their countryman's emergence as a genuine contender in Formula One. Barrichello had spoken movingly yesterday about how he wanted to capture the imagination of his home country in the way Ayrton Senna did, but even he could barely believe the scale of support.

Fans came in record numbers to see the man they were dubbing "the new Senna". More than 2,000 policemen were drafted in to shepherd the near-100,000 spectators into grandstands with their flags and samba drums. As he passed around the circuit, set in a bowl with a magnificent view of his São Paulo hometown as a backdrop, he was followed by a Mexican wave of near-hysterical support.

His drive was as pulsating as it was nerve-wracking, but the writing was on the wall from the moment Johnny Herbert, Barrichello's British team-mate, ground to a halt with mechanical failure after 12 laps. The Stewart Ford's vulnerability cost the Brazilian dear last year and the car's breakdown, when his engine seized at the end of lap 43, ensured that he is still seeking his elusive maiden victory.

There was no comfort for Hill either. The race was barreling under way when he made an ambitious attempt to dart down the inside of the Benetton of Alexander Wurz. Unfortunately, Wurz shut the door on Hill, with the result that they banged wheels, damaging the Jordan's suspension.

Coulthard's race also went from bad to worse. Starting three laps down, his McLaren started to develop more problems, preventing him from completing half the race. It was another depressing day for a man forced yet again to watch from the pit garage as his team-mate reeled off lap after lap. Having lost the lead once, Hakkinen was in no mood to make any further mistakes once Schumacher and Barrichello had their pit stops, leaving him a clear path to the chequered flag.

Five Nations Championship: Brilliant performance augurs well for World Cup campaign

AS the Five Nations champions, Scotland can look forward to a future as bright as the orange shirts that constitute their gaudy change strip. By the time the World Cup comes around, and a full complement reports for duty, who knows what might be achievable. South Africa, who are in their pool, will have taken note. After their highest score against France, the superlatives rained down on a Scotland team that some are hailing as the best of all time. Premature, perhaps, but they have a legion of new admirers. Unlike its predecessors, what this team possesses is a talented three-quarter line and attacking ability that has set the benchmark in the championship, for which Scotland were 100-1 outsiders before hostilities began in February. Yet three wins out of four, an average of 30 points and four tries per match cannot be argued with. They came to Paris confident of victory and executed their game-plan with aplomb. It would not have been an injustice if they had scored 50 points.

Previous Scotland sides had gifted individuals, but not the overall swagger with which their latter-day counterparts go about their business. In 1990, for instance, Scotland ground their way to success. Bill McLaren, who has witnessed fluctuating fortunes for Scotland for more than half a century, believes the Scots are on the verge of something special. "They are as good a Scotland side as I have seen, including 1984 and 1990. And it can only get better."

One may question French commitment, yet their starting three-quarter line was the same one that shut the door on England at Twickenham. One had to rub one's eyes in disbelief at the eight-try spectacle that unfolded in a bewildering first 28 minutes. After Niamack has scored his ninth Five Nations try, after a break by Thomas Castaignede that resulted in the injury that forced him to retire hurt after only two minutes, Scotland retaliated with venom.

Within five minutes Scotland had scored three times; Martin Leslie was first, after Logan's initial break and Tait's inside pass. From the restart Metcalfe countered 60 metres, Niamack just got back, but with a huge overlap on the right Tait trotted over. Four minutes later and Scotland were out of sight.

Townsend darted from a scrum and became only the fifth player to score tries in each round of the Five Nations. Suddenly, Scotland were 21-5 ahead. Generally, France failed to read the lines of attack, the simple inside passes that set Grimes or either of the Leslies galloping into space, with Townsend looping in support and Tait waiting to finish the approach work. Scotland's angles of running, the ability to move the ball out of the tackle and keep it alive, were exemplary. In many instances, the catalyst from deep was Glenn Metcalfe, enjoying his best match for his adopted country. He made Tait's second try, which again stretched Scotland's advantage after Juliet had driven over, almost scored himself when just failing to outpace Niamack, and then threw away a try for Tait by delaying his pass a second.

France were not helped by the loss of Castaignede, who is expected to be out for two months, and Carboneau, about whom the prognosis is more bleak. Pierre Villepreux, the assistant coach, talked about injuries that had deprived France, but there was no excuse for a pitiful lack of spirit. For their part, Scotland can point to the absence of Tom Smith, Eric Peters, Dodie Weir, Bryan Redpath and Duncan Hodge at various stages this year. Villepreux also tried to make light of a first season without a championship home victory since 1957. He suggested that the players will "cancel this Five Nations and prepare for the World Cup. This was a bad moment for French rugby, but only a moment."

Dominici's try and Aucagne's penalty goal left France trailing 33-22 at half-time. Their forwards were starting to rumble and one wondered whether France could turn it around. Perhaps, if Niamack had not been held back by Tait when about to take Dominici's scoring pass, things might have been different in a second-half that was no less compelling for the scoring of only three points from Logan's penalty.

To be critical, Scotland then played a percentage game, forsaking the style that had served them well. Poor kicking by Armstrong and Townsend put Scotland under pressure, but they held firm and denied France a single second-half point. Gary Armstrong, the captain, said: "We are a good team building for the World Cup. We ripped them to shreds." And how.

High Five is warning to superpowers

Throw away the form books because the last weekend of five nations rugby has confounded us all. France get the wooden spoon and Scotland win the championship. If you had tried to put money on this occurring three months ago you would have been able to name your own price.

I was enthralled with what I saw this weekend. And if any of the so-called superpowers of the Southern hemisphere think they are going to breeze past these teams in the World Cup, they had better book early flights home.

Scotland were remarkable, rattling up 30 points in even time against a French side that deserved last place. What has happened to the French? They were terrible in defence. It was as if they had decided to go on a tackling strike.

It has been wonderful to witness Scotland and Wales develop throughout this championship. They are playing adventurous rugby and being rewarded for persevering with it even though it has cost them important lessons.

The coaches, Jim Telfer and Graham Henry, have instilled the confidence and joy which so obviously comes from playing this sort of game. They deserve a lot of the credit for what has been a tremendous championship, as their teams have been involved in all the most exciting contests.

England must be a shattered unit after yesterday's defeat. They were very solid throughout without being great. Although it was probably their most adventurous outing in the tournament they still failed to finish the job after creating the foundation to do so.

Their inability to turn pressure, possession and territory into points has been a problem for some time and they have finally paid the price.

The English defence continually disrupted the Welsh into error. However, the pack as a whole were matched by a determined Welsh eight, surprisingly in the scrum.

Behind the Welsh forwards was Neil Jenkins. What a day he had! He kicked everything, including the injury time, match-winning conversion, but it wasn't just this that was so impressive. His reading of the play, passing, tackling and covering was a joy to watch. He really has come of age as a fly half. There may be more flamboyant No.10s, but there would not be too many coaches who would prefer someone else at fly half.

MICHAEL LYNAGH

He is so reliable - and I am not just talking about his goal-kicking. He has often stated that his play doesn't get the credit it deserves due to the high-profile ability he has to kick. I know how he feels. He is a skilful player and, finally, he is being given the opportunity to demonstrate this.

So where does this leave the World Cup? France have to get their players fit so they can put their best outfit on the pitch, otherwise it could be embarrassing. Their coaching also has to be assessed. Their obsession with attacking the short side does not work, as it is so easy to defend. Sometimes it is not the players' fault, although the way they tackled on Saturday it was clear their hearts were not in it.

Ireland were unlucky throughout. They have to come up with some ideas of how to create tries other than the good old Garryowen. They were a big improvement on last year but they must become more creative and consistent.

Wales were the team to watch. They played attacking, well-thought out rugby using all the skills. If they continue to play like this they will be a handful for any team. Scotland were the big surprise. Great backs, who combined well with tough, uncompromising forwards in the typical Scottish tradition with some new modern skills thrown in.

England need to find the recipe of winning not only through outstanding defence but also with offence. For all their domination on the pitch, they didn't thrill or reflect this domination where it counts - on the scoreboard. Fine, but sometimes you need to take chances and with it comes the glory. Just ask Wales.

'Jenkins should get the credit he richly deserves'

Telfer: change of style

Jim Telfer was back home in Galashiels yesterday. He had joked about digging his garden but, rather than turning some old sods, he was watching the denouement of the Five Nations Championship from Wembley.

There have been times when Telfer has been regarded as a bit of an old sod himself. But even when players reeled off the training field, cursing his name, there has never been less than total respect for what he has done for Scotland, as player, captain, coach, director of rugby. At 59, Telfer says it is time to move on, to hang up the tracksuit - others are not so sure.

When the remarkable match in Paris was over and Scotland sat proudly on top of the table, John Rutherford said that he, Hugh Campbell and the players had asked Telfer to stay on as head coach. This was through no feeling of inexperience or inadequacy - Rutherford was an outstanding player and is becoming a fine coach, preparing Scotland's backs while Campbell looks after the forwards - but there is that intangible relationship between the trio that they do not want to let go.

Not that Scotland have done with Telfer yet. He reverts to his role as director of rugby for the Scottish Rugby Union in November, when the World Cup is over, but Saturday marked the termination of a 34-year association with the Five Nations. It began, neatly enough, against France in 1964,

Dictator who rules by consensus

David Hands reports on the Scotland coach's decision to take a back seat

when Scotland shared the championship with Wales - an accomplishment that eluded them for the remaining six years of Telfer's career as an international.

Telfer's talent as a back-row forward was enough to take him on two British Isles tours, but the former rector of Hawick High School's global recognition has come as a coach - to Scotland and, in 1983 and 1997, to the Lions. In that role his sheer intensity frightened people; he bludgeoned players into accepting his diktat, but even amid a torrent of words, the technical accomplishment and analysis came through. When he spoke on Saturday of the way Scottish moves came to fruition, there was a sense of frustration that France's defence had not been more impenetrable, so high are Telfer's standards.

"Jim has changed since I was a player," Rutherford said. "He realises he is dealing with professional players and puts far more onus on them to make decisions. When I played, our club rugby was so bad that he had to lift players to international level by sheer force of personality." It did not leave much room for softer emotions and the most over-worked adjective in the lexicon for the coach was "dour".

But there has always been a dry humour to Telfer to alleviate the harsh demands he has always made of players, and even he could scarcely shift the smile that played across his features on Saturday. This was a Scotland side roundly written off by all but themselves before Christmas but which, given better goal-kicking against England at Twickenham, might have won the grand slam.

"I never look at a team and think how good or how bad they are," Telfer said. "You just keep working away with what you've got." In that respect, this 1999 squad will live long in his memory. Few Scotland teams have attacked with the panache shown this season, although none will displace the 1984 grand slam-winning team from premier place in Telfer's affections. Then he was the sole coach and Scotland had not slammed anyone for 59 years.

"I take far more notice now of what players say, we discuss everything," Telfer said. "The players agreed that we needed to target three players - Castaignede, Carboneau and Niamack. There was nothing left for me to add. I'm a consensus man now."

MONDAY MATTERS

Time catches up with a boxing great who refuses to acknowledge the final bell

Hearns trapped in hollow ring

It is the early hours of Sunday in Manchester and fighters ancient and modern are still doing the business in the Arena. Naseem Hamed, the self-proclaimed Prince of Boxing, has finished his own gruelling struggle to overcome his fellow Yorkshireman, Paul Ingle. Now, he is ringside, watching a legendary competitor who is back answering the saddest call in the profession: fighting beyond his prime.

Asking Thomas "The Hitman" Hearns, once a world champion at six weights, to fight on the undercard to Hamed is like asking Michael Schumacher to drive in support of Eddie Irvine, or asking Zinedine Zidane to do the running for Didier Deschamps.

Hearn is fighting as a professional before a British crowd for the first time, at the age of 40. He wins, over 12 uncombative rounds, against another former champion, the declining Nate Miller, from Philadelphia, but the 18,500 audience has dwindled to next to nothing.

Hamed is ringside, watching but simultaneously conducting business on his mobile, shaking hands, raising the left hand he says was broken in the 11 rounds against Ingle.

What he was witnessing was the inevitable ring of truth, that time waits for no man. In August, Greg Norman has shown the sportsman's compulsion to return to a place, a course, that stripped him of his dignity a couple of years ago. But that was without the dangers that go beyond a man's ego, the dangers that do not need spelling out in connection with prize-fighting. Hearn stepped into the ring in a daffodil yellow gown but there is not much of spring left in him, and little of the primal beast that he once was. As the millennium approaches, boxing remains a legal exercise and continues to stimulate excitement among men, and women. Jane Couch, the leading woman boxer, was among those at ringside and was on her feet in anticipation when Ingle managed to bloody the nose and threaten, albeit transiently, to dethrone The Prince.

For a moment it appeared that Ingle — who endeared himself to many with his statement "Naz may have his Lamborghinis and Ferraris, but I've got two whips and a ferret" — could dramatically close the gap. It had been an evident gulf, indeed, for while Ingle had layer upon layer of courage, Hamed seemed, in the early rounds, to be a man gifted with extraordinary feline reflexes and an altogether more rapid transmission from brain to fist.

As that bout wore on, courage, almost to the point of threatening Ingle's own physical wellbeing, came mighty close to equating the accumulation of stinging, hurtful, but less than concussive blows of Hamed.

For this, Ingle pocketed

£300,000, and it is not likely that Hearn, prolonging a career long past its bedtime, accepted less. Yet he swears that money is no longer the motive. He is looking for respect, though heaven knows he earned enough for five lifetimes.

As one of nine children to a Detroit mother, Hearn won 155 amateur contests and a further 59 victories in the professional ranks. Using extreme dieting techniques or carbohydrate loading, he shuttled up and down weights covering a range of more than three stones.

Still in his corner, having been there for the remarkable 21 years in which Hearn contested 21 world title bouts, is Emanuel Steward. The same trainer is now involved with Hamed and gave this salutary verdict. "Naseem up to now has gotten away with it with his speed, strength and youth. Now he is beginning to fight younger, tougher guys, and he is needing to change to a more durable way of fighting."

Durability, alas, has now eluded Hearn. After Hamed was made to appear more fallible than he likes to believe, a sadness dwelt on

The Hitman. The weight never used to be apparent around his waist; the torso never used to wobble when hit; his punches did not sound like hollow slaps. He is a man groping through memory, and if Steward has any real influence, he should terminate the compulsion now.

The music does not hit the right soul notes any more. A dozen years ago, the only time I witnessed Hearn in his prime in the flesh, Diana Ross and The Three Degrees heralded his entrance. Dennis Andries, a Guyanese out of Hackney, was knocked over five times in ten rounds that were savage, raw, frightening evidence that Hearn, that day fighting for the world light-heavyweight title well above his natural weight, was possibly the most debilitating puncher in the business.

"What a wicked fight!" Hamed had said in the Manchester Arena near midnight. He had meant it as a tribute to Ingle, but it had echoes of the past.

Wicked had been the failure of anyone in the corner of Andries to spare their man the damage from his own reluctance to stay down when hit by The Hitman. And wicked, indeed, is the spectacle of that same Hitman now harming himself. "I wouldn't encourage a boy to start a professional boxing career," Hearn had said after the Andries beating. "If I had known what boxing was all about before I started, I don't reckon I'd start." Now he cannot finish.

Hearn left Manchester repeating that he wants respect, wants two defences of his new title, and will then team up with Steward, training youngsters to follow in his footsteps. The cycle, ultimately, is one of sad glory.

Fowler can find wider fame by acting out his fantasies

What does a footballer do once the Football Association's disciplinary machine has chewed him up, spat him out and packed him off on a long suspension to reflect on his terrible misdeeds? Heads for the silver screen, of course. Could it be that a long and prosperous career in the movies awaits Robbie Fowler?

It is a path taken already by two of the game's worst miscreants. Eric Cantona filmed his debut role in Le Bonheur est dans le Pre while serving a nine-month ban for flattening a Crystal Palace supporter. Last seen mumbaling a few honours in the "Oscar-winning" Elizabeth, Manchester United's most celebrated bad-boy will shortly be seen in a boxing movie with Mickey Rourke.

Vinnie Jones won more critical praise for his thuggery in Lock, Stock and Two Smoking Barrels than for his suspension-marred efforts for Wimbledon, Leeds United and Wales. "You're the champ," Dustin Hoffman told him at the premiere of the gangster film, and Jones will be back doing what comes naturally again soon. How long before the former hod-carrier turns Oscar winner?

Even if Fowler's acting talents are found not quite to stretch to the big screen, there are always the television studios and the opportunity of a lucrative chat show, as Ian Wright, another of the baddest men on planet football, has shown. Even Gary Lineker went all controversial for the sake of enlivening his television career, as anyone who has seen him cracking blue jokes on They Think It's All Over will vouch.

So the solution is obvious

for the Anfield striker as he contemplates a longer summer holiday than expected thanks to the FA's overzealous disciplinarians. Get himself a movie agent and wait for the scripts to flood in.

Mike Leigh will surely be able to find a part for a Scouse scally in his next council estate drama. A sacked Liverpool dockworker, perhaps, who dislikes gays and has to suffer terrible rumours about drugs.

The serious conclusion to it all is that there is money, and a career far beyond football, to be made out of a reputation for controversy, so the Liverpool and England striker should look on the bright side as he contemplates his six-match suspension.

The FA may have attempted to make an example of him, to say that there is no place for his kind of mischief and to make sure every footballer toes the line of good behaviour. The rest of the world takes a rather different view and will await his next goal celebration with eager anticipation.

Supporters love controversy, sponsors pray for it, provided it is kept within reason, and the game should hope for it too. "It is bad for the image of football," say the officials, but there is no more overused or misguided argument. Punch-ups, rows, feuds, spats, arguments and bad jokes about drugs are what football people love, otherwise the press would not write about them with such relish. It is half the fun, maybe more.

In a few years' time, if not already, Fowler's line-sniffing will be celebrated as a piece of brilliant individualism. "I see other footballers out there, and I don't want to name names, but I think they are in danger of becoming robots," Tony Adams said in these pages on Saturday. "You get this guy who suppresses all his feelings because he is fearful of the press and you don't show any emotions." Someone with only a passing interest in football will hazard a guess that Adams was referring to Alan Shearer, England captain, brilliant goalscorer and expert at sitting on the fence. Shearer's stonewalling is now so mannered that it has almost become a standing joke, yet in the dressing-room, he is known to be a spiky character, as willing to speak his mind and play a practical joke as any. Put on stage in front of hundreds of young supporters last week at the Match of the Day Live show at Birmingham's NEC, Shearer was witty, charming and good-humoured. He even raised a laugh.

For reasons best known to himself, though, he prefers to play to the image that he spends his spare time creating the fence. It is a largely wholesome ideal that has earned him millions, but thank goodness there are also footballers who do not mind exposing a little of themselves, sometimes more than they perhaps intended. Sport is about personalities as well as players.

One such is Fowler, who is now paying for it dearly. Of course he deserved punishment for his disastrous taunting of Graeme Le Saux, but the four-match ban and £32,000 fine for his line-snoring goalscoring celebrations suggest that he is being judged for who he is — a troublemaking rebel — rather than what he did, which was stick two fingers up at some Everton fans. Anyone who went out and took cocaine after that is beyond help already.

There is a strong expectation now that Fowler will not appeal against his sentence. The club want him to serve his time immediately, and the FA has made dark noises about increasing his penalty should he dispute it. But fight on, he should. It might not do his immediate football prospects any good, but all the controversy will certainly be good for his movie career.

With 32,000 runners preparing to take to the streets of the capital in the Flora London Marathon next Sunday, Leviathan (BBC 2, Wednesday, 7.30pm) takes a timely look at the classic origins of the race. Chris Eubank, the former boxer, is an elegant if idiosyncratic choice of presenter for the feature, which traces the race from the battle of Marathon 2,500 years ago to the modern Olympic Games.

LYNNE TRUSS

News of Robbie Fowler's ban and fine are a reminder of life on another planet. I was just getting ready to criticise the rather arrogant Scotti McCarron for apparently smirking over Greg Norman's misfortunes on the 12th on Saturday, when an uninvited vision of Fowler pointing his bottom at Graeme Le Saux threw it into a more normal perspective.

You get used to a different kind of etiquette at a well-run golf event like the Masters, where patrons, even on practice days, are told to "set pagers to vibrate". Broken borders are almost never hurled at the players here, you know. Homophobic abuse of an obscene nature is kept to a minimum. And as far as I know a chorus of "Who ate all the pie?" has never been heard in the vicinity of John Daly, despite the arguable justice of the comment.

In fact, spectators here are given pretty strict behavioural guidelines in a special message from "Robert Tyre Jones Jr" (Bobby Jones), reprinted annually in the Spectator Guide. First written in April 1967, this message explains that it is "appropriate" to "applaud successful strokes in proportion to difficulty, but excessive demonstrations by a player, or his partisans are not proper because of the possible effect upon other competitors."

He goes on: "Most distressing to those who love the game of golf is the applauding or cheering of misplays or misfortunes of a player. Such occurrences have been rare at the Masters but we must eliminate them entirely if our patrons are to continue to merit their reputation as the most knowledgeable and considerate in the world."

Even if you set aside the special etiquette of golf, what happened to the old idea that American fans trample over the sporting sensibilities of the world? Somewhere I grew up with the idea that Americans were bad sports, but either I have been in the wrong places, or it simply is not true.

At the National Indoor Arena last week, British Davis Cup fans had no compunction whatever about celebrating every American double fault, at Madison Square Garden last month, when Evander Holyfield fought Lennox Lewis, British fans booed The Star-Spangled Banner, and intimidated the locals (no mean feat, to intimidate New York fight fans).

Clean-cut American soccer supporters had various rude awakenings at their World Cup first-round matches last summer, not least a full-scale political rally at Lyons staged by expatriate Iranians that made the faint, collegiate cry of "U. U. USA!" look decidedly small potatoes.

Here at the Masters, the interest in — and support for — international players has been emphatic and heart-warming. Seve Ballesteros is an adopted son; so are Nick Faldo and Bernhard Langer. Colin Montgomerie is welcomed warmly, and Ian Woosnam's caddy, Wobbly, met his wife in Augusta, you know.

Ask anybody. The message seems to be that charisma goes rewarded, wherever it comes from. And where there is unfortunately no charisma to speak of (in the case of Olazábal), sympathy for stoicism in adversity is called on to compensate. Adoptive favourites this weekend have been Olazábal and Norman, and you cannot tell me that bad feet and shocking shoulder respectively did not come into that.

Suffering alone is not enough, however. Perhaps deliberately soliciting the sympathy vote — or to make himself sound more interesting, after his record run of consecutive birdies — Steve Pate revealed to The Augusta Chronicle on Sunday a whole catalogue of personal misfortunes that make chronic foot sores like a picnic. Car accidents, freak falls on boating trips and a million-to-one knocked-off-bicycle-by-spooked-deer incident have interfered to devastating effect on his career, and it seems that they now speak of Pate and the coyote in the Roadrunner cartoons in the same breath. Had the crowd known all this, they might have cheered him all the more. But as it was, they cheered him for his birdie-birdie-

Oddly, Norman denied he was getting special treatment from the fans on Saturday. Standing under a tree outside the clubhouse on Saturday evening, as shadows lengthened across the course, he said it was untrue that he had been singled out; that you could hear them cheering other players on other holes as well.

But if he was fighting shy of being the "sentimental favourite", you cannot blame him. "How do you define a sentimental favourite? Is that because of what happened in 1996, or because I'm old?" he asked, distastefully, on Friday. As a sportsman, he would obviously prefer to win the Masters not because the event morally owed it to him, but because he had recaptured top form.

The truth is, however, that the two things cannot be disengaged. Every time Norman toughed out, every time he showed nerve and resolve, his performance was bound to be assessed entirely in terms of his famous blow-up three years ago. Had he laid those ghosts, or were they thumbing their noses at him yet again?

On Sunday morning, I have to say, we were as taut as piano wire here at Augusta. Monty might win, or Ernie Els (my tip), or that nice Davis Love III. More than anyone, however, we wanted Norman, because the sight of that poor bloke rolling on the 15th green in despair (while managing to keep his hat on) was something we could not bear to see repeated. Like the sight of Robbie Fowler pointing his bottom, it is an image once seen, never forgotten.

August figures provide real sense of occasion

The weight of history and tradition are handled effortlessly at Augusta, of course, but you can't help wondering how the club will continue to cope in another 50 years, when a bit more history has accrued. By then, you see, the like Pond, the Founders Circle, the Nicklaus Plaque and the Hogan Bridge will be jostling for attention with the Norman Bunker, Couples Corner, and the Woods ... er, Wood. Not to mention all those little wayside shrines to Seve in the bushes. Is there room for more tradition in this place, or is it all filled up? That's my only worry.

Already, whenever an Augusta National visitor spots a circular break in the perfect grass they rush to take a look at it, assuming it commemorates yet another famous moment in Masters history. And whoever Sprinkler was (Jeff Sprinkler? Bobby Sprinkler?), he must have done a lot of exciting things on this particular golf course.

The best tradition, of course, is the old-time champions teeing off at 8am on Thursday. This year, with a combined age of about a thousand, Sam Snead, Gene Sarazen and Byron Nelson did the business, and it was excellent, the occasion helped by the sort of morning — with dewy grass and daffodil-sky — that Wodehouse describes as "all Nature shouting 'Fore!'". It really felt good to be alive. Signs of new to Augusta, I'd been feverishly wondering whether the poor old fellas were expected to trudge off down the hill to complete 18 holes, while a hundred younger blokes snapped impatiently at their revered heels. Once I realised it was just a ritual of striking the ball, I could relax. And it was great. What a way to start a tournament. As he took the tee, Snead said: "Oh, I just try to keep up with Gene." (Lots of laughs.) He was then introduced as the man with the best golf swing of all time; at which he said, mock-dolefully, looking at the driver in his hand, "Well, that oughta do it."

One day, of course, an octogenarian Nick Faldo will appear on the identical tee with a cheery wave, and golf fans yet unborn will assume he was always a free and easy bloke who liked a laugh. The precision mowing will be the same, likewise the wisteria around the clubhouse, the green-jacketed officials and the waiting smell of that leathery bacon they have in America that is nothing like the proper bacon we have at home. But people will cheer in the same manner and it will be just as lovely, a ceremonial event. Especially when, as in unbroken previous successive years, Seve Ballesteros, that lovely old jokesmith, clears his throat ("Ahem! Oh, my apologies!") just as Faldo makes his backswing.

Blooming bushes deny search party

The futile search for Greg Norman's lost ball at the 12th on Saturday afternoon created an interesting scene. Any green-fingered observer who had assumed the azaleas and dogwoods were held in high esteem by the golfers at Augusta was in for a nasty shock as Norman and Lee Janzen, together with caddies and officials, tore urgently into the bushes as if searching for a bomb. So much for the glorious horticulture, eh? As they manhandled the Asiatic jasmine, it was like watching someone brutally body-search your maiden aunt: you half-expected the bushes to cry out. "Unhand me, sir!"

Nobody wanted Greg to fall foul of the five-minute rule, yet to see someone at this elevated level lose a ball was highly consoling, not to mention hilarious. As they trampled the pine-straw — digging into the bush, shaking it, and all but pulling it out by the roots — I inwardly cheered on behalf of all who have ever spent two or three hours in the long grass tearing their hair out and yelling "Look, it can't have just disappeared."

As he completed his round, after a great comeback on the 12th, where he got a two with his second ball, and the 13th, Norman was still saying: "I'd just like to know what happened to that ball." To which one can only say: Join the club.

I met a woman on Friday who used to have her hair cut by Darren Clarke's wife. Really. On Wednesday I met a man who knew a man who lived next door to Jeff Maggert's caddy. It was that sort of week.

If I'm honest, leaving the golf aside, the Masters was a bombardment of inconsequential details and unanswered questions. Why was Ian Botham sitting outside the clubhouse on Tuesday? Why were so many men either smoking (or fiddling with) big fat cigars? Why was a man trying to sell Beany Babies to the passing traffic beyond the gates? Did he sell any? Even of Maple, the Canadian bear, a rare item?

Personally, I was very touched to see, at a nearby filling station, a large display of drinks tins arranged to spell out "WE MISS JACK" — referring, presumably to the absent Nicklaus. Sadly, I mentioned this affectionate tribute to a colleague, who suggested: "Perhaps he used to buy a lot of petrol." Which rather ruined the effect.

A lot of my enthusiasm for this year's Grand National ended at the last flight in the race before, the Martell Aintree Hurdle, and with a shot that the Grandstand cameras never showed. The race was overburdened, those smaller and flimsier obstacles over which a horse seldom falls. They are, though, with their high wooden bars and their tendency to spring back, the worst-designed obstacles in the history of equestrian sports.

Veneta Williams, a great admiration of mine, had entered an untried horse called Stretcher in this elite race. This, I thought, was typically audacious. This sort of thing is just not done. But she is a lady who knows what she is about. Alas, the race developed in the way it was expected, with a stirring duel between the brilliant Istabraq and the giant French Holly. Stretcher nowhere. Then news came through that he had fallen at the last and had been put down.

At once, the bubbles went out of the day. It was that faint whiff of personal involvement that did it. I could see the merriment of this attempted coup against tradition: I know a little of extraordinarily meticulous preparation that goes on in the Williams yard. To run a horse in a jumping race is always a serious matter, and always one with a hint of gaiety about it.

That is why it is always such a blow when a horse is injured or killed. It is the champagne glass dashed from your lips, it is hearing some serious and depressing news in the middle of telling your favourite joke. It is a hard one for television to cope with, too: the clichés don't work. All you can do is put over the facts, leave a moment's pause, and kick on. It is this, the proximity of frivolous joy to most serious death, that gives the edge to National Hunt racing. I am never quite at ease with it.

Perhaps no one ever is. The Grand National is an almost hysterical occasion: longed for and dreaded. It takes a lot to worry a jump jockey, but they feel a terrible mixture of physical terror and stage fright, two things that bring out extreme performances in humans and animals.

Trainers and owners who have prepared all year or all their lives for this event, feel that strange last-minute that dread. They said so again and again during the build-up: I again during the build-up: I just hope he comes back safe. The viewer is entitled to finally emerges after Becher's Brook, second time round. There was a brief glimpse of some X-certificate mayhem, and then Blue Charm emerged as the day's hero, lobbing along in front with such delightful ease that you could hardly believe the disasters he had left in his wake.

It must be wonderful, then, the terrors tamed, the horse in a rhythm, jumping strongly and nothing left to do — especially go an outsider — but to revel in your luck and your horse. Oh brave old world, that has such creatures in it.

Blue Charm was caught on the run-in, and so the story of the day was the Carberry family and the swinging from the rafters, a great piece of television, destined for much re-running. But those tracking shots of Blue Charm said everything about the good bits of National Hunt racing. I am sure that it was not just me who wished to change places with his jockey, Lorcan Wyer.

I bet many people who have never sat on a horse in their lives felt the same thing: tasting with television's perfect vividness the horse and rider's mutual delight in the conquest of deadly danger.

Eudipe was killed after the mayhem at Becher's General Wolfe got round, so did Suny Bay. Part of me never got over the unseen fall in the hurdle race before, and another part will always envy Wyer and the long minutes of fulfilment over the final dozen fences. The hardest thing in the world: and for those two or three minutes, it was easy.

England suffer fresh setback to World Cup hopes

FROM RICHARD HOBSON IN SHARJAH

SHARJAH (India won toss; India vs England by nine runs)

FOR the third time in five days England slipped to defeat, albeit a narrow one, under the floodlights here yesterday and each successive loss raises more concern a month ahead of the World Cup.

India displayed greater composure under pressure and England are now certain of finishing bottom of the Coca-Cola tournament even if they beat Pakistan tonight.

Much of the game followed the pattern of the previous meeting last Friday which India won by 20 runs. After losing the toss England contained the batsmen for the majority of the innings, only to suffer in the closing stages before losing wickets at the head of their reply.

A target of 240 on another low, slow pitch would not have troubled a side playing at its peak. Confidence is draining rapidly from this squad, however, and none of the top order seemed less at ease than Alec Stewart, the captain. He has now gone 17 one-day internationals without a half-century.

Playing and missing with indecent regularity, he was finally put out of his misery when Srinath won a leg-before decision when Stewart had scored two runs in 21 balls. As events transpired England had every reason to be grateful to Ganguly for dropping Knight at slip with the left-hander on 12.

ing 50 of the first 70 runs, a succession of partners carried less conviction. Wells, who had replaced Croft, his Prasad for a straight six only for the bowler to accept a return catch in the same over, and the experiment of using Ealham to swipe early boundaries failed as a misunderstanding with Knight resulted with his being run out.

When, four overs later, Hick fell to alert wicketkeeping by Mongia, stumped down the leg side attempting to sweep Kumble, England were precariously placed at 66 for four, facing elimination from a tournament envisaged optimistically as a vehicle to raise morale ahead of the World Cup which starts on May 14.

A further problem emerged over the weekend when Alan Mullally, one of the few players to finish the recent Carlton and United tournament in Australia with his reputation enhanced, reported a side strain. England have taken the precaution of registering the injury with the International Cricket Council (ICC) in case he fails to respond to treatment.

The 15-man squad has been told that contracts must be signed by April 26. Tim Lamb, the chief executive of the England and Wales Cricket Board, delivered the terms yesterday when he arrived ahead of an ICC meeting to discuss World

Stewart sets off for the pavilion after his latest failure as the India fieldmen congratulate Srinath, the successful bowler

Cup issues. Including wages paid by their counties, each player stands to earn around £60,000 by winning in the final on June 20. Lamb said that the terms were not negotiable.

He arrived at the CBFS Stadium as India were beginning to accelerate. That their runnings started slowly had much to do with Angus Fraser, the replacement for Mullally. His first spell of eight overs cost 15 runs and figures of one for 24 from ten tested to the virtues of line and length regardless of conditions.

Cough had bowled Ganguly between bat and pad, Fraser confused Ramesh with a ball that rose a little more sharply and the attempted pull looped towards Wells at wide mid-on. With Kambli, attempting to rebuild his international career after alcohol problems, succumbing to a fine running catch by Hick off Ealham, England might have thought they could restrict India to below 200.

However, Jadeja, standing in for the injured Azharuddin as captain, has proved himself an imaginative leader of the side. A decision to promote Srinath realised dividends with the fast bowler striking 28 from 29 balls and Dravid moved through the gears to reach 69 before Fairbrother ran him out with a direct hit.

The final thrust came from Jadeja himself. Seemingly a step ahead of Stewart's bowling changes, he struck seven fours in an unbeaten 74 from 67 balls. After taking three wickets in his only over two days earlier, he had made another enormous contribution.

Thorpe scored the bulk of the runs in a stand of 53, but Jadeja set clever fields to stop Fairbrother generating a rhythm at the crease. A fine delivery by Prasad eventually removed the Lancashire batsman and, two overs later, Auson became his third victim when he was bowled attempting a lusty heave through mid-wicket.

Thorpe started to look for boundaries rather than nudge singles but with 36 required from the last four overs the element of risk continued to grow. After scoring 79 from 87 balls he went down the wicket to Joshi, missed and was stumped. Cough raised hopes of an improbable win by driving Srinath for six but in the same over Fraser was run out.

Warrington suffer at hands of Wigan walking wounded

Wigan Warriors.....24
Warrington Wolves.....10

By CHRISTOPHER IRVINE

ST HELENS remain two points clear at the top of the JJB Super League with the only 100 per cent record after Warrington Wolves had their unbeaten run brought to an end in a game of contrasting halves at Central Park yesterday.

It was only after Wigan Warriors had surged 18 points clear in 35 minutes that Warrington offered genuine competitiveness. Two quick strikes after the resumption raked the home side, who got back on track when the impetuous Andy Farrell landed a fourth goal to add to a superb earlier try.

Farrell and Jason Robinson, filling in at half back, were evidence of the injury problems at Wigan. These worsened when Haughton and Johnson were helped off and the side concluded the last ten minutes with 12 players.

"Last year we hardly had any injuries. Now we're picking up a couple a week," John Monie, the Wigan coach, said. With Kris Radlinski forced to sit out his first game for two years, Monie was delighted with the performance at full back of Wes Davies, grandson of Billy Boston, whose full debut contained enough electric bursts to draw the odd parallel with the legendary Wigan wing.

In the first half, Warrington never managed a clean break and Wigan's first two tries were scored from acting half back, the first by Reber and the next by Connolly after the visitors had been penalised for holding down in the tackle.

When in possession, Warrington lacked creativity and their defence was found wanting again as Farrell's dummy prised a gap down the right. With the line 40 metres away, no-one was going to deny the Wigan captain his first try of the season, which he converted from the touchline.

Warrington had shipped too many points to get back on equal terms, but as Lee Briers began to direct operations, Huntie claimed the scrum half's kick to the left corner for their first try. When Briers ran the ball on the last tackle, smart handling worked Roache over on the opposite wing.

Farrell reasserted Wigan's control after Duffy was caught ball stealing. His one slip was a missed conversion of the final try, after Moore had gone over for the conclusive score.

Gregory blue as Reds fade

Salford Reds.....17
Castelford Tigers.....29

By A CORRESPONDENT

VULNERABILITY in mid-field, where the tackling became increasingly fragile, cost Salford Reds their fifth consecutive JJB Super League defeat at The Willows yesterday, after they had established an 11-point lead after just half an hour. In the end, the superior pace and power of Castelford Tigers decided what was a lively contest.

With only four victories in 23 Super League starts, Andy Gregory, the Salford coach, was understandably disappointed after witnessing such an encouraging start by his side. "My job isn't on the line," he insisted. "I'll be here until the end of the season. If we start winning, then who knows what will happen?"

A crowd of 3,663, little more than half of the number for Salford's two previous home fixtures, were right to be enthused by their side's initial onslaught which, deservedly, brought tries for both Stuart Little and Neil Baynes, and goals for Steve Blakeley and Carl Briggs.

It was then that Danie Orr, the Castelford half back, began to stamp his authority on the proceedings. His scorching break and long pass gave Michael Eagar his sixth try in three games and, just before the break, he initiated a superb touchline move involving Francis Maloney and Adrian Vowles before Richard Gay ripped past Paul Carige to score.

Brad Davis sent Maloney hurtling in under the posts soon after the break. Orr then kicked his third goal before adding a penalty and, although Joe Faimalo collected Salford's third try in a rare breakout, Castelford pulled even further away with a superb score, created by Orr for Jason Flowers. Further goals from Orr and Ian Tonks added to the visiting team's tally.

With four victories from five games, Castelford are now enjoying their best ever Super League start. Much harder tests await them, however, and they are conscious that they will have to play better than ever to sustain their good run of form.

SCORERS: Salford: Three: Little, Baynes, Flowers. Goals: Blakeley (2). Dropped goal: Briggs. Castelford: Three: Eagar, Gay, Maloney, Flowers. Goals: Orr (4), Tonks (2). Dropped goal: Orr. ## Eagles prey on Rhinos

Sheffield Eagles.....22
Leeds Rhinos.....16

By A CORRESPONDENT

A REMARKABLE second-half fight back gave Sheffield Eagles a rare JJB Super League victory over Leeds Rhinos in a thrilling encounter at the Don Valley Stadium yesterday. A year after being denied by the odd point in 47 on home soil, Sheffield gained sweet revenge by out-scoring the Silk Cut Challenge Cup finalists by four tries to two, continuing their steady improvement.

Leeds, who clearly have the Wembley final on their minds, looked to be cruising to a comfortable win when they led 14-4 at half-time, but Sheffield, the Challenge Cup holders, slowly, but surely, hauled themselves back into a match they had seemed ready to let slip.

Led by the guile of their full back, Dave Watson — who more than made amends for his first-half sin-binning — together with the power and persistence of Johnny Lawless, the hooker, and Dale Laughton, the prop, Sheffield clawed their way back. Tries by Rod Doyle and Simon Baldwin, plus two goals by Mark Aston, had led the scores at 16-16 after 70 minutes. Leeds had been restricted to a solitary second-half penalty by Iestyn Harris.

However, with just seven minutes remaining, Sheffield snatched the lead for the first time when Aston slotted a penalty, after Adrian Morley had been sin-binned for obstruction, and, in the closing stages, Geoff Hardy crashed through for the try that brought the biggest crowd at the Don Valley Stadium this season to its feet.

Leeds, who have now lost three of their past five Super League matches, had appeared to be in almost total control before the interval as they ripped Sheffield's defence to shreds with wave upon wave of effective attack.

Tries by Paul Sterling and Morley, who finished off a scintillating handling move involving six of his colleagues, plus three goals by Harris, edged Leeds ahead, but Doyle's opening try, on 33 minutes, set the scene for the rousing renaissance as Sheffield secured their third victory in the space of just nine days.

SCORERS: Sheffield: Three: Doyle (2), Baldwin, Hardy. Goals: Aston (3). Leeds: Three: Morley, Sterling. Goals: Harris (4). SHEFFIELD EAGLES: O Watson, K Lovell, O Powell, K Senior, B Sode, J Hardy, M Aston, O Laughton, J Lawless, O Brown, S Baldwin, O Turner, R Doyle. ## Goulding proves inspiration to end Giants' losing streak

BY OUR SPORTS STAFF

A brief glimmer of hope as he barged over to make it 18-12 at half-time.

Danny Russell, the Huddersfield captain, scored after the break and after 57 minutes Goulding completed the scoring with his fifth goal from seven attempts.

Shaun McCrae, the Gateshead Thunder coach, is pleased with the improvement shown by his Super League newcomers after their second home victory, a 22-14 defeat of Halifax Blue Sox at Gateshead International Stadium on Saturday.

"We're better defensively than we showed in the games against Leeds and St Helens," McCrae said. "I've been happy with our performances and we've made a good start at home, but it's vital we start picking up points away."

The margin flattered Halifax, who are nothing like the side that finished third last year. Their third defeat of the season was confirmed when Willie Peters, the Jivewire Gateshead scrum half, intercepted a pass by Graham Holroyd and won a 50-metre sprint to the line.

Gateshead's all-Australian outfit showed far greater pace and creativity as they raced ahead with tries by Kerrod Walters, their captain, and Craig Simon. Gavin Clinch and Darryl Cardiss responded for Halifax, but the Thunder took control again when Ben Sammut followed up a kick by Will Robinson.

"Gateshead are a confident team," John Pendlebury, the Halifax coach, said. "They play percentage football and defend with enthusiasm, so they are very hard to break down."

RACING: CLASSIC BETTING CHANGED AFTER GODOLPHIN'S TRIALS IN DUBAI

Island Sands impresses

By CHRIS McGRATH

PRECISELY as Paul Carberry was taking the National Hunt season to an exuberant climax, swinging from the rafters in the winner's enclosure at Aintree, thousands of miles away a rather more discreet drama was serving to ignite the new Flat season. In the desert evening of Dubai on Saturday, Godolphin took the gloves off its most promising three-year-olds in an attempt to establish a pecking order for the European classics.

Two trials over a mile, for colts and fillies respectively, were staged under authentic race conditions, extending to the participation of Frankie Dettori and other experienced jockeys. The results should make punters grateful for Sheikh Mohammed's recent expression of bemusement that bookmakers had prejudged the relative merits of horses yet to be properly tested. Sure enough, Mithai and Dubai Millennium were among those to forfeit prominent positions in the Sagitta 2,000 Guineas or Vodafone Derby betting after disappointing in the colts' trial. Instead it was

Island Sands, barely mentioned by the wagging tongues of winter, who confirmed how he has thrived in the sun. His closest pursuers were Mukhalif and Adair, whose performance augured extremely well for their prospects when stepped up in distance: both are likely to tackle traditional Derby trials.

Island Sands was recruited by Godolphin after two impressive wins for David Elsworth at Salisbury last season. A son of Turtle Island, he proved on the second occasion that he could handle soft ground with the same facility as his sire, but he evidently handled much firmer conditions with ease at Nad al Sheba. William Hill cut him to 14/1 from 25/1 for the horses yet to be properly tested. Sure enough, Mithai and Dubai Millennium were among those to forfeit prominent positions in the Sagitta 2,000 Guineas or Vodafone Derby betting after disappointing in the colts' trial. Instead it was

In the fillies' rehearsal, Etizaz finished a close third and remains a very plausible fancy for the Sagitta 1,000 Guineas. Overall, though, Crisford warned: "Our plans for the Guineas remain open, as we need to see how the horses do over the next few weeks and how they travel to England."

Dettori rode Etizaz and was confident that she would improve for the trial, in which she was narrowly foiled by Pescara, a French import, and a real dark horse in Zahrat Dubai. The latter would appear an intriguing Vodafone Oaks prospect, while Calando fared creditably enough to remain a possible for the Sagitta 1,000 Guineas. That race is off the agenda, however, for Karamyah, who has had a setback, while plans are on hold for the disappointing Saytara.

The first draft of Godolphin horses to be trained in Newmarket this season will fly from their desert base on April 25, five days before the Guineas meeting. That same classic weekend, of course, Sheikh Mohammed is dreaming of yet another new frontier in the Kentucky Derby. There was a chastening defeat on Saturday, however, for Prado's Landing — something of a "sighter" for Godolphin — in the Blue Grass Stakes at Keeneland. He finished last, doubtless emboldening local scepticism about the challenge of Worldly Manner and Aljabr.

A series of more conventional trials begin on domestic soil with the Shadwell Stud Nell Gwyn Stakes at Newmarket tomorrow. In Ireland yesterday, the recent defeat of Stravinsky was compounded by a disappointing run from his stablemate, Black Rock Desert, in the Gladness Stakes at Leopardstown. Cl André Fabre yesterday criticised the Vodafone Derby after Slickly had won the group two Prix Noailles at Longchamps. "It is too hard a race for three-year-olds," he said. "It has not produced a decent stallion in years and lives on its reputation. I would rather win the French Derby than at Epsom."

SAILING

Garside aims to sail into the record book

SAILING CORRESPONDENT

MIKE GARSIDE, the former SAS officer at the helm of Magellan Alpha, remains the only Briton left in the Around Alone Race and, one day into the fourth and final leg from Punta del Este, Uruguay, to Charleston, South Carolina, he is showing signs of enjoying his self-appointed task.

The man, who 16 years ago cruised round the world with his family and then returned to the sea in the Finot-designed Magellan only to find he hated her privations and her awkward temperament, has been saying how much he disliked the challenge from the day he set off last September. But things finally gelled on the third leg through the Southern Ocean and Garside is even rumoured to be considering further campaigns.

In the meantime, he has set himself two goals: to win the 5,700-mile final leg and to set a record time by a Briton.

Winning the leg is going to be difficult. J. P. Mouligne, of France, in the slower blood-red Cray Valley, produced the performance of the race with his successive leg wins in Class 2. Mouligne has an eight-day lead over Garside but is in no mood to sit on his laurels.

Garside, in turn, is only nine hours ahead of Brad van Liew, of the United States, in Balance Bar, in the overall standings. The American is capable of winning the leg himself in a boat optimised for light-air, upwind racing.

As for the record, Garside is well up on Josh Hall's time of 157 days when coming third in Class 2 in 1990-91. "I am aiming for a time of 26 days for the leg which, when added to my elapsed time of 107 days, will hopefully give me a final total of less than 134 days," Garside reported yesterday from a position about a mile behind Van Liew and Mouligne, who were tied for the early lead.

Srikumar Sen sees the champion show a worrying lack of stamina

Hamed locates escape route in nick of time

NASEEM HAMED came close to defeat against Paul Ingle when they met at Manchester on Saturday. If Ingle had not walked into a left in the eleventh round, he might have stopped the World Boxing Organisation featherweight champion, who appeared to be running out of stamina at the time.

If Hamed does not want to live dangerously, he should put himself in the care of Emanuel Steward, who trains Lennox Lewis. Hamed had called him in as an adviser at a late hour, and it was just as well, because it was Steward who gave him the punch with which to finish Ingle.

All right long the champion belted Ingle about the head and body but, before the decisive blow, he had managed to put the challenger on the canvas only twice: in the first and in the sixth. Yet the Scarborough man came back and in the second half almost turned the contest around.

Ingle gritted his teeth and stuck to his game-plan of pressuring Hamed in the second half when the champion was expected to tire. Ingle took charge from the eighth, often catching Hamed with good jabs. In the ninth he hurt the champion, whose desire for a fight suddenly appeared to leave him. Hamed either backed around the ring trying to get out of Ingle's way or threw wild swings that the challenger had no trouble avoiding.

By the tenth, Hamed's nose was bleeding freely. It was in the eleventh that Steward injected some of his expertise. He told Hamed not to rely on punches around Ingle's guard but to go straight through the middle.

As Ingle tried to force the pace, Hamed shot out a short left through the middle. With

Hamed celebrates his twelfth title defence

Ingle coming in, the blow caught him high on the head and sent him flying onto his back. Even though he got up and tried to continue, the referee, Joe Cortez, stepped in.

"It is the mark of a great champion to get yourself out of a difficult situation like that," Steward said. Hamed's discomfiture in the closing rounds can be gauged from the fact that he had wanted to see Thomas Hearn against Nate Miller in the contest immediately after his bout but was unable to return ringside until Hearn's bout was almost over.

Hamed has become a more rounded boxer under his new trainer, Oscar Suarez. His boxing has been tightened up and balance improved. But his stamina needs attention. His boxing in the first six rounds was of the highest class. The double left hook that sent Ingle to the floor in the first and the left to the body that grounded the challenger in the sixth were high-quality punches.

It was nice to see Hamed giving credit to Ingle for the gallant effort that has earned the Scarborough man a place on HBO's list of fighters. "I give credit to Paul," Hamed said. "He took some really hard shots, got off the floor and came back to turn on the heat." Ingle added: "I was really enjoying it from the seventh round."

Hamed's failure to stay in charge after dominating the contest in the first half will cause his team concern. That is why he should look to Steward. "He was close to defeat," Steward said. "For the first time, his nose was bleeding. He has been getting away with much because of his punch and youth. But as he fights more, a lot of guys are going to be younger and stronger. He has got to make adjustments."

Hamed blamed a hand injury, sustained around the fifth round, for his failure to keep up the intensity and accuracy of his first-half boxing. He is to have an X-ray today. "I don't think my hand is broken," Hamed said. "After the sixth round, my hand really started to hurt. As much as it hurts, I'm not really bothered, as long as I can punch."

"I felt confident, from round one, I was going to win. I felt definitely stronger than him and when I knocked him down in the first round, I knew something was going to happen."

Hamed, who admitted that Ingle had given him one of the toughest fights of his career, now intends to unify the belts and, hand permitting, will meet Manuel Medina, the International Boxing Federation champion, or Luisito Espinosa, the World Boxing Council title-holder, in July.

VOLLEYBALL

Perfect ten as Malory complete double

BY RODDY MACKENZIE

LONDON Malory do not know the meaning of defeat when it comes to a cup final. The English League champions continued their unblemished record in finals when they won their tenth Westfield Health English Cup in 13 years at Ponds Forge, Sheffield, on Saturday.

The 15-12, 15-7, 12-15, 15-13 win over City of Liverpool was not without anxiety, particularly when Liverpool clawed back the third set as Tom de Smet, their Belgium junior international, and Mark Brennan, who went on to take the most valuable player award, picked holes in the Malory block.

In the final set, De Smet made a costly error of judgment at 12-13 when he elected to play a ball that was drifting out of play and Malory went on to win the service back. It was the momentum they needed to take the trophy and complete the league and cup double.

"I guess winning the cup ten times in 13 years is not too shabby," Jefferson Williams, the Malory player-coach, said. "Liverpool surprised me as they raised their game and they were a very tight unit." Williams, who had been on the sidelines for six weeks with a knee injury, brought himself on court after the first set and played a large part in the victory with his outside hitting.

There was a surprise in the women's final when Loughborough, in the final for the first time, took the trophy with a 15-4, 15-11, 15-6 over London Malory. Malory were handicapped by the absence of Audrey Cooper and Amanda Glover, who were in Mexico to compete in the Acapulco world series beach tournament. However, Loughborough fully deserved the win and took just 71 minutes to overcome the London side.

AN AIRPORT TERMINAL
SHOULDN'T CHANGE THAT.

Life is short. So shouldn't queues at airports be a thing of the past? We think so. That's why Aer Lingus has its very own security checkpoint. So while other passengers queue to have their luggage and themselves checked, our Premier Class passengers are whisked through in just a few minutes. Even at the airport.

CORPORATE PROFILE: Energis

Mike Grabiner, left, chief executive, with Chris Hibbert, finance director, have seen shares in Energis soar. The company, whose chairman is Gordon Owen (top centre), was created by wrapping telecommunication cables round National Grid's earth wires. (top right) A national control centre manages its network

THE FACTS

Market Cap: £5.3 billion.
Revenue 1997-98: £187.9 million.
Profit: Pre-tax loss of £11.7 million.
Employees: 1,200.
Business: Energis concentrates on providing specialist, and often tailor-made telecommunications services to the corporate sector but is also now the biggest carrier of domestic internet traffic through its tie-up with Dixons Freesave.

THE BOARD

Gordon Owen, 60, has been Energis chairman since the company was formed in September 1992. A former group managing director of Cable & Wireless, for which he worked for 37 years, he was also managing director of its Mercury Communications subsidiary. Other chairmanships include Utility Cable, Acorn Computers and Yeoman Group.

Michael Grabner, 47, held a number of senior positions in BT, including director BT Europe and director Global Customer Service before becoming chief executive of Energis in January 1996.

Chris Hibbert, 50, joined Ener-gis as finance director in May 1996 and joined the board in October 1996. He is a former fi-

October 1990. He is a former finance director for BT Networks. Energis has four non-executive directors: Christopher Rodriguez, 47, chairman of the audit committee, is group chief executive of Bradford & Bingley Building Society. Stephen Box, 47, joined the board of Energis when he became finance director of The National Grid. Prior to that he spent 20

Grid. Prior to that he spent 25 years with Coopers & Lybrand. Nigel Walmsley, 56, joined the board in 1997. He is chairman of Carlton Television and an executive director of Carlton Communications. David Jones, 56, chairman of the remuneration committee, joined the Energis board in 1994 after his appointment to the board of The National Grid as group chief executive of South Wales Electricity.

I must have seemed a bizarre, long shot of an idea when first suggested. The National Grid, the UK's electricity distributor should launch a telecommunications service for the business market. But at least the roads wouldn't have to be dug up. The Grid network could be replicated quite easily by hanging telephone cables from electricity pylons and using any other electricity conduits on offer.

Yet Energis, which was formed only in 1992 and has yet to make a profit at pre-tax level, has just joined the UK's industrial elite in the FTSE 100 and is capitalised at more than £5.3 billion.

When Energis was launched on the Stock Exchange in December 1997, its shares were 290p, although the valuation was clearly influenced by the troubles of an apparently similar high-tech telecommunications company, Ionica. Whereas Ionica crashed, Energis shares have flourished spectacularly and are now more than £18, having been £19. Last year, they outdid all other shares on the Stock Exchange, except for the telecommunications rival Colt.

Has Energis simply been swept along by sentiment in favour of the telecommunications sector, where mention of the terms "Internet" and "corporate data" can send shares soaring? Can its valuation be mistaken, let alone increased?

Mike Grabiner, the Energis chief executive, whose first $18,000 share options bear a price of 108p, albeit linked to inflation, says: "What the market says about us is based on the acceleration and growth of the data and interactive market, particularly the Internet, and then it's based on our ability to capitalise on that."

Energy's financial trends do not quite match the explosive growth of the share price, but show a strong upward path. The company had revenue of £4.6 million in 1994-95, £42.8 million the next year, and £97.1 million in 1996-97, before last year's £167.9 million. A high proportion of revenue is from advanced services rather than voice telephony. Analysts now forecast that Energis will make pre-tax profits of about £28 million in 2001 — earlier than most of its New Age rivals. The company is already benefiting from having begun with a clean slate of paper, and therefore “no legacy systems”; a polite term for old bits of inherited copper wire.

Engris is close to being a “virtual” telecommunications company, with everything from engineering and maintenance to payroll outsourced and with the bulk of its 1,200 staff working in sales, marketing and customer services.

Even so, Grabner acknowledges that Engris has been lucky in timing. If it had been set up just six months earlier, the company might have chosen a more traditional network, he believes. Instead, it built the latest, integrated high-speed fibre-optic network, operating at 2.5 billion bits a second and, in places, at 10 billion.

Analysts believe that the network structure has given Energis a two-year lead. The technology has been combined with a precise business strategy. Energis would begin working with a particular company at a modest level to prove its re-

WHAT THE

"Energis has been carried along by a lot of new age technology that differentiates Energis from the rest. Management has demonstrated the ability to stay ahead of the curve."

bility. Another big data job was to link Mirror Group's London headquarters with the Scottish Daily Record in Glasgow. "They want the ability to change pages late in the day," Grabiner says. "You must give them bandwidth on demand and the network has the capability to reallocate bandwidth. For Boots, the key issue was a four-second transaction time at point of sale linked to everything from customer database to stock control.

Energis now has 3 per cent of Britain's corporate telecommunications market. But it is the Internet (for which there was no profits forecast in the original Energis business plan) that is causing excitement. The first big step was the £75 million acquisition of Planet Online, a "Web farm" providing storage and connectivity to the network for corporate websites. Even more eve-

catching. Dixons last year began its Freeserve Internet service with Planet, and Energis carries the traffic. Energis is now the UK's largest Internet carrier, and the domestic traffic — largely evening and weekend — uses the network when

For Grabiner, the significance is more than simply filling empty capacity. "The faster the home Internet market grows, the more a number of corporates are going to realize they must get into this business," he says. "When they do that, we are really very well placed to take advantage."

Although a multimillionaire on paper, Grabiner rates quite well in Crisp Consulting's "fancy car quotient," as does Energis. His pay topped $4 million last year, but 90 per cent of it came from the value of share options and non-executive directors are "significantly underpaid". Integrity Works, assessing ethical expression, says that Ennergis is to communicate a new brand and values this month. Its present code of conduct is similar to that of National Grid, which still owns 40 per cent of Ennergis.

As well as trying to gain from the Internet, Energis is extending local access to up to ten cities through MetroHolding, a venture with Deutsche Telekom and France Telecom. The company will almost certainly join a consortium to bid for a new third-generation mobile telephone licence up for auction in the next 12 months. Energis also feels well placed to be the UK's first Internet Protocol telephone company — offering integrated speech and data via the Internet.

Of course, the bubble may burst, and telecommunications stocks may suffer a correction or be sucked down by a more general collapse. The lack of pre-tax profits would not help in a general freefall. But that is not how City analysts see it. John Tysoe, of SB Securities, puts his views on Energis's likely future as two questions. "What if the Energis share of the corporate market grows not from 3 per cent to 10 per cent, but actually grows to 15 per cent?" Tysoe asks. Hardly daring to say it, he adds: "What if the corporate data market grows not by ten times but by 100 times?"

Referral casts shadow over Tesco

Terry Leahy, chief executive of Tesco, is expected to report another set of encouraging figures, with sales up about 7 per cent

TESCO: Final results from Britain's biggest supermarket chain tomorrow are likely to be overshadowed by the referral of the food retailers to the Competition Commission. Even so, brokers are looking for another impressive performance from the group, with estimates of pre-tax profits ranging from £860 million to £870 million. The comparative figure for the previous 52 weeks is £817 million and £832 million for the actual 53 week period reported.

The dividend will come in at 4.2p, up from last year's 3.9p. Total sales growth for the year of about 7 per cent is forecast with a like-for-like sales increase of about 3.5 per cent, slightly up on the figures released by the group in its trading statement on January 18. These figures showed total sales growth of 6.5 per cent in the 20 weeks to January 2, with like-for-like sales up 3.1 per cent.

Total sales over the crucial six-week Christmas period were 7.4 per cent ahead or up 4.1 per cent on a like-for-like basis.

Tesco has decided against giving current trading updates with either full or half-year results and is, instead, updating the City on a quarterly basis and continuing to issue the Christmas trading statement.

Brokers will be looking for any changes to its Clubcard loyalty scheme, after reports that it is to be relaunched in the summer.

Analysts will also be seeking information on the uptake of Tesco's free Internet service as well as news on growth plans for its overseas operations in the wake of the referral to the Competition Commission.

Tesco recently bolstered its position in Asia by forming a joint venture with Samsung to develop hypermarkets in South Korea with Tesco holding 81 per cent. It also operates stores in the Irish Republic and central Europe.

BT Alex Brown, the broker, rates the stock a "strong buy" and expects strategic returns from overseas diversification to start to flow through after 2002, but said that further growth in the UK "should ensure a steady earnings stream". It is forecasting pre-tax profits of £870.2 million.

SC Securities is looking for £870 million with a dividend of 4.1p while Teather & Greenwood is also looking for £870 million.

PETER BLACK: Final results from the leisure retailer on Tuesday will include the actual eight-month and pro-forma 12-month figures to January 31, 1999. There should be no surprises after Gordon Black, chairman, reported in mid-February that pre-tax profits for the year to January 31 would be not less than £21.7 million. Williams de Bro's Jeremy Hilditch is forecasting a rise in the dividend to 7.6p from 7p following earnings of 23.2p, compared with 21.4p.

RIVA GROUP: Brokers were warned in January that the group does not expect pre-tax profits for the year ended December 31 to exceed £700,000 as a result of charges relating to a decision to exit from direct operations in Spain and Denmark. That compares with £1.3 for million 1997.

The exceptional costs of this action remain uncertain, but the impact on the group's profits is unlikely to exceed £1 million. The group achieved a strong performance in its operations in the UK and France and Benelux, but had a disappointing December, with the anticipated revenues for three projects moving out of December and into the new year. No dividend is anticipated.

SERVOMEX: The final third of the group's financial year is a key period representing about 70 per cent of group revenues and profitability.

When the expected level of revenue generation in this important period failed to materialise, this electronic and electrical equipment group — currently in offer talks — was forced to issue a second trading statement stating that profitability in 1998 would be substantially lower than the previous year.

It also became apparent that further exceptional costs would be needed to restructure the business and lower its cost base to meet lower demand levels.

Brokers fear that with net debt rising to £5.2 million for the year end, interest cover falls to 2.8 times and that may mean a reduction in the final dividend from 9½p to 3½p with earnings down from 20.3p to 7p.

Pre-tax profits of £1 million are forecast, struck before restructuring charges of about £750,000. In 1997, Servomex made £2.95 million.

WARDLE STOREYS: Half-year results, due out today, are likely to show pre-tax profits up from £5.4 million to £5.7 million on sales down 10 per cent at £53 million. The group, which supplies inflatable systems and emergency escape drops, is also expected to raise the payout from 7p to 7½p.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

After last week's quarter-point rate cut, the markets will be waiting for evidence of whether the Bank's rate cutting spree has further to go. However, with only a limited amount of data scheduled for release this week it is unlikely that any clear picture will emerge.

The most interesting release will be the British Chambers of Commerce quarterly survey on Thursday. The survey, which is regarded as the most comprehensive examination of the business climate, is not expected to reveal any startling information but should suggest that recovery remains tentative. The Bank received a draft version ahead of last week's meeting and so it may have influenced its decision.

Today, the British Retail Consortium should provide fresh evidence that consumer spending is beginning to pick up as confidence improves with high street sales benefiting.

The German January manufacturing data, which is released today, is likely to be viewed as justifying the ECB's half-point cut last week. MMS International, the economics forecasting group, estimates that pan-German monthly production will decline by 0.5 per cent.

In the US, the only data of great note are the inflation figures released tomorrow. While short-term fears that the Federal Reserve may be forced to tighten rates are unlikely to disappear, a small increase in the inflation rate to 0.3 per cent should not worry the markets too much.

MPs begin inquiry into branded goods' prices

By SAIED SHAH

THE high price of branded goods is likely to come under fire this week in a Commons investigation that is expected to call for a change in trademark law.

The influential Commons Trade and Industry Committee, chaired by Martin O'Neill, will begin hearing evidence on Wednesday on "trading, trademarks and competition" in an inquiry that will focus primarily on "parallel" imports.

These are branded goods sourced unofficially outside the European Union and sold at discount prices. Under current European law, manufacturers have the power to control such imports, but the MPs are likely to attack this as being a way of keeping prices up.

The European Commission

O'Neill: to hear evidence has also said that it is concerned by manufacturers using a law meant to protect their goods from being copied as a way to restrict supply and so maintain high prices.

Typical parallel imports include designer goods such as well-known makes of perfume, jeans and sunglasses.

The inquiry follows the committee's investigation of car prices in the UK last year. The MPs' strongly worded report found that British buyers pay 35 per cent more for cars than consumers on the Continent and called for prison sentences for car manufacturers and dealers who systematically overcharge.

Lindsay Hoyle, Labour MP for Chorley and a member of the committee, promised a "robust" report, due in the summer, to put pressure on the Department of Trade and Industry for a change in the law.

He said: "The consumer is being ripped off, whether it's for CDs or cars. There is a general ethos that you can charge more in the UK, and this is not acceptable."

Gas complaints rise

COMPLAINTS and inquiries to the Gas Consumers Council rose to record levels last year amid fears that gas companies are rushing into business with poor customer service (Christine Buckley writes). GCC staff dealt with 300,000 inquiries — an 8 per cent increase on the previous year — as competition in the household market became established throughout the country. Serious complaints leapt by 36 per cent to 60,479. The majority of complaints concerned household supplies.

Defending the indefensible

Amid all the horrors of Kosovo, the economic and financial aspects have naturally received scant attention. But for anyone who thinks about government finances, these events should raise serious questions about an issue once regarded as of supreme importance but which has hardly figured in recent public debate: namely, what proportion of our national income we should properly devote to defence.

In relative terms, Britain has made a significant contribution to the current Nato campaign against Serbia. But the absolute number of aircraft involved is small. Of course, this is partly the result of a deliberate decision to minimise the risk of British losses, but it is partly the result of necessity. For small though the numbers are, they form a significant part of Britain's total forces. Given that we are simultaneously deploying forces in far-flung parts of the world, our resources are severely stretched.

So what, you might say. There are still those who think that any defence spending is money down the drain and anything saved from the defence budget is an unalloyed benefit. Let us hope, for the sake of consistency, if nothing else, that such people take a thoroughly non-interventionist view in the current situation in the Balkans — and elsewhere.

A more common view is that Britain's small Armed Forces are simply the inevitable result of her reduced importance in the world. At the beginning of this century, Britain was still the world's leading economic power. At the end of it, she is the world's fifth-largest. But hold on. This is only part of the story. Britain may be a lot smaller than she was, but fifth-largest is not tiny. Yet look at any of the actual or potential conflicts with countries, such as Serbia, whose GDP barely ranks on the world scale at all, and our military resources look remarkably small. Apologists would say that there is a vast difference in quality, and they have a point. But the real reason is quite different. We no longer spend much on defence.

The absolute amount sounds impressive enough — some £22 billion a year. This makes it the fourth-largest consumer of taxpayers' money. But the Government spends four times as much on social security as it does on defence. Spending on defence amounts to about £400 a year for each person in the country — roughly the cost of a cheap package holiday to the sun, or three times the average person's annual expenditure on the National Lottery.

Moreover, real spending on defence is set to fall by 3.6 per cent this year, and by a further 2 per cent over the following two years.

ROGER BOOTLE

With the economy growing strongly, this means that the share of the country's GDP spent on defence is set to fall sharply. Twenty five years ago, it was 6 per cent. At the time of the Falklands conflict it was still 5 per cent. As recently as five years ago it was 3.3 per cent. It is now down to 2.5 per cent. If we had simply maintained defence at the share it had five years ago, current spending would be 30 per cent higher — implying 30 per cent more planes, ships and troops.

The numbers in the Armed Forces are now at pitifully low levels. All three services combined now total just under 220,000. Six years ago the figure was 50,000 higher. The Army is now so small that it would very nearly fit into Wembley Stadium. The Royal Navy would be positively rattling around. As for the Royal Marines, they are now surely outnumbered by the burgeoning ranks of stress counsellors.

Why have we allowed this situation to develop? Because if the world were a safe and secure place then defence spending could properly be regarded as pure waste, and when the country is not engaged in a war, it is tempting to believe that the world is a safe place. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, it was widely believed that we could enjoy a "peace dividend" in the shape of lower defence spending, implying the scope for reduced taxation and/or increased spending on other things. To shrewd judges, this always looked like an illusion. In many ways the world had become a more dangerous place. Yet spending on defence continued to be pruned.

There were other illusions, namely that high technology would provide both effective and cheap protection, and that even if it didn't, someone else — Uncle Sam — would continue to do the job. Yet the US has also made some massive cuts, to the point where its defence expenditure is now less than 3.5 per cent of GDP. In Europe there is a food idea that by pooling European resources we can come to some impressive numbers. Yet Italy, Denmark, Germany, The Netherlands, Belgium and Spain spend less than 2 per cent of their GDP on defence. In terms of expenditure per head of the population, the US spends two-and-a-half times as much as Germany, three times as much as Belgium and four times as much as Canada. How much longer are the American people going to be prepared to foot the bill for other countries' protection?

The upshot is plain. Defence just cannot safely be squeezed any further. Indeed, if the world continues to develop on current lines, then public opinion will have to be prepared for a significant increase in defence spending. The implications could be significant — not only for government finances but also for the defence industries and the jobs market for young people. Forget the "peace dividend". We have effectively spent it several times already. It may soon be time to ask for some of the money back.

Profits surge at Savoy after revamp of hotels

By DOMINIC WALSH

THE Savoy Group will today reveal a surge in profits that will provide comfort to Blackstone and Colony Capital, the American investment firm that paid an astonishing £520 million for the hotel group last May.

The posh and highly conservative hotel chain will report a 39 per cent jump in gross trading profits excluding exceptional items to £41 million.

from turnover up 10.6 per cent to £112.7 million.

Its pre-tax profits rose 23 per cent to £28.7 million, while revenue per available room rose 16 per cent to £211 as the effects of a £90 million refurbishment programme kicked in.

This was most marked at Claridge's, one of its four London hotels, where the completion of a £42 million revamp boosted sales by 38 per cent and operating profit by 99 per cent.

Ramon Pajares, managing director, said the group continued to invest on improvements. Some £2 million will be spent upgrading the Lancaster ballroom and two private banqueting suites at the Savoy, and a similar amount is being spent at the Simpson's In The Strand restaurant.

Mr Pajares said trading in London was still buoyant, with operating profit in the first three months of 1999 some £1.2 million higher year on year. He said there had been no impact from the Yugoslav crisis but admitted: "If the Russians get involved, people might get nervous. But so far, there has been no negative effect."

A revaluation of the group's properties, which have now been transferred to separate legal entities, has lifted the net asset value from £391 million to £580 million. Mr Pajares said: "This reflects the restoration programme and investment we have done, the higher gross trading profits of the group and the profitability we have forecast for 1999."

He admitted that, in the context of what the new owners had paid for the group, the revaluation "gives them some comfort". He said Blackstone continued to evaluate opportunities to acquire further hotels but nothing was imminent.

The sale of the Savoy Group to Blackstone and the subsequent restructuring resulted in exceptional costs of £7 million.

Biotech fund set for 3i move

THE investment group 3i is the favourite to win the contract to manage Biotechnology Investments Limited (BIL), the large offshore fund advised by RBU, NM Rothschild's biotechnology unit (Paul Durman writes).

BIL is seeking a new manager after failing to agree a merger with International Biotechnology Trust, a UK investment trust and the RBU's other flagship fund. The endless wrangling between the boards of BIL and IBT contributed to Rothschild's decision to withdraw from the biotech sector.

The decision to appoint 3i is understood to have angered Domain Associates, which advises BIL on private American investments.

At one stage in the IBT negotiations, BIL proposed awarding Domain its management contract. One source, close to the parties, said Domain is considering legal action against BIL.

Last week IBT said its £60 million of investments will in future be managed by Merlin Bioscience — a new firm that will be created when senior members of the RBU, including Jeremy Cornock Cook, join Merlin Ventures, the biotech investment group headed by Chris Evans, founder of Chiroscience and Celsis International. IBT intends to continue taking advice from Domain.

Both BIL and IBT have performed badly over the past two years.

MARTIN MYERSCOUGH, an accountant with a biotechnology background, will today disclose that he has achieved what James Dyson, the vacuum cleaner entrepreneur, has so far been unable to do — design and launch a revolutionary new washing machine.

Mr Myerscough and his company, Monotub Industries, have beaten Mr Dyson to the post with the launch this morning of Monotub's Titan washing machine at the Design Museum in London.

Mr Dyson, whose Dyson Appliances company sells more than £100 million worth of his distinctive vacuum cleaners each year, has long suggested that his next product would be a washing machine.

Monotub's Titan launch is the culmination of six years' work, which began when a washing machine engineer complained to Mr Myerscough about design faults of the front-loaded washers that dominate the UK and European markets. Mr Myerscough, who is finance director of KS Biomedix, the biotechnology group, drew on his original training as a marine engineer to produce what he says is the one of the two main makers of washing powder, and a chairman with washing-machine industry experience — Michael Hearn, former head of Servis.

The launch will be followed by meetings with retailers such as John Lewis and Comet, and Mr Myerscough expects the "Titan to be in the shops by summer 2000 at £550 to £600. This premium price will pitch it against products of AEG and Bosch of Germany in a market sector in which 400,000 machines a year are sold in the UK. Monotub says that it can make a profit selling just 12,000 a year.

Dyson remains unruined. "We are working on a number of new products," it said. "We have not specifically mentioned a washing machine."

Business optimism has returned to levels last seen a year ago, a new survey published today reveals. The Institute of Directors' business confidence survey shows that the balance of directors feeling more optimistic about their companies climbed from 7 per cent in December to 40 per cent in March. Other survey indicators, including employment and output balances, also ticked higher, while cost and pay pressures remain weak. The balance of companies reporting improved profits also hit the best levels seen since December 1997.

Costa stirs up coffee battle

By DOMINIC WALSH

THE PROFIT IN COFFEE

COSTA, the upmarket coffee bar chain owned by Whitbread, is turning up the heat in the battle of the espresso bars with plans to open more than 50 units in the next 12 months in an attempt to stay ahead of a new wave of market entrants led by Starbucks of the US, Scottish & Newcastle and McDonald's.

Whitbread bought out the Costa Brothers business in October 1995 for an estimated £15 million to £25 million. In the same year an American couple, Scott and Ally Svenson, decided to launch their own chain in London, calling it Seattle Coffee Company. The move was followed by Coffee Republic, set up by a lawyer, Sahar Hasbemi, and her brother, Bobby, an investment banker, who saw a gap in the market.

Almost three years on, Costa, Seattle and Coffee Republic are the clear leaders in a market comprising about 300 outlets, most of them in London. All are ploughing ahead with vigorous expansion plans. Under Whitbread, Costa has tripled its turnover to almost £40 million. Scottish & Newcastle has recently dipped a toe in the water by developing its own concept called Espresso and last month bought ten sites from Sofia, the Turkish café operator, for an estimated £2.5 million.

The most surprising development was last month's £10 million-plus acquisition by McDonald's of the 23-strong Aroma chain — only the second time the US fast food behemoth has strayed outside its burger format. McDonald's is planning 250 Aromas and even hints at an eventual move across the Channel.

Fears that the market is overheating are countered by a recent report from Mintel, the market researcher, which suggests that there is scope for at least 1,500 coffee bars over the next three to four years.

Telecom Italia seeks rescuer after defence farce

By CARL MORTISHED
INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS EDITOR

TELECOM ITALIA is in search of a white knight following the total collapse of its defence strategy over the weekend.

Italy's biggest takeover battle descended into farce when the former state telephone monopoly failed to round up enough investors to consider its plans to fend off a $65 billion (£40 billion) bid from Olivetti. Speculation was mounting over the weekend that other European telephone utilities, such as BT or Cable & Wireless, might enter the fray with a bid or a strategic alliance to trump Olivetti's €1.50 per share offer, widely viewed as undervaluing the company. BT previously denied it was interested but the sudden reversal in Telecom's fortunes may enter the British company. SBC Communications, the US company is also mooted as a partner. Only 22 per cent of investors registered their presence at an extraordinary meeting in Turin on Saturday, well short of the 33 per cent needed to table a vote on the defence strategy of Franco Bernabè, Telecom's managing director. Embarrassment at the no-shows was compounded by earlier indications on Friday from Telecom Italia that it had secured the necessary quorum. Sources close to the company were yesterday pointing fingers at the government, which owns 3.5 per cent of Telecom and is widely viewed in the Italian media as supporting the Olivetti camp. "They did not even register their stake," said one source close to the company. Telecom Italia said it would consider the Olivetti bid when the offer document became available, expected in two weeks after it is reviewed by the stock market regulator, Consob. The company also said it "will evaluate any proposals which the market might present and mandate the chief executive officer to carry out any analysis in this regard". Advisers to the company confirmed that Telecom Italia was throwing the door open to interested third-party bidders. One banking source indicated: "The right message to the market is that this is an important telecoms company with attractive assets. A little local difficulty could prompt others to come forward." The government will play a key role in Telecom's future as it retains a golden share. Massimo D'Alema, the Prime Minister, previously hinted that a foreign bidder would not be welcome. Telecom Italia is not ruling out calling a further meeting to consider the third pillar of its strategy, the buyout of the outstanding shares in TIM, its mobile phone associate. However, the failure to secure a quorum on proposals to enfranchise savings shares and a share buy-back make a further meeting unlikely.

Markets get jitters after Compaq blow

By ALASDAIR MURRAY

INTERNATIONAL markets are braced for a nervous start to the week after a surprise profit warning from Compaq, the world's biggest personal computer manufacturer, raised a large question mark over the health of the US technology sector.

In an after-hours trading statement on Friday, Compaq said first-quarter profits were likely to total only $9.4 billion, about half the level Wall Street analysts had been expecting. The news sparked a rapid markdown in technology stocks, a sell-off that is expected to gather speed today. Although the Dow Jones industrial average recorded solid gains of 3.5 per cent last week, finally establishing itself firmly above the 10,000 level, analysts are concerned that share price rises in the index have been unevenly spread.

A flood of first quarter earnings is due in the next couple of weeks, and further disappointment could end the rally that has driven the Dow more than 10 per cent higher this year.

European computer companies such as Olivetti, Siemens and STMicro could also be caught in the firing line, while European markets have been heavily reliant on the lead given by a buoyant Dow this year.

Compaq shares fell sharply in after-hours trading on Friday, sliding to $26.25 from the official closing price of $30.94. Rival computer hardware manufacturer Dell lost 8 per cent while Intel, the computer chip-maker, slid 3.5 per cent.

Microsoft, the software manufacturer, declined by a more modest 1.5 per cent. However, shares in IBM and Hewlett-Packard, Compaq's two biggest rivals, were not traded on Friday and are expected to suffer heavy losses today.

Compaq blamed the profits warning on an "unfavourable sales mix", with lower sales of high-margin items such as computer servers and increasing competition hitting prices.

Analysts believe the problems stem from an unexpected slowdown in the business sector computer market, which has left Compaq with high stock levels.

Compaq is not the only computer manufacturer to have disappointed in the past few weeks. 3Com slumped 10 per cent last month after giving warning of lower profits, while in February Advanced Micro Devices, which makes clones of Intel devices, also issued a profit warning.

However, not all analysts believe that Compaq's problems are shared by the sector and point out that the shares are already well below the January high of $50 because of concerns about its performance. Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer of First Albany Corp, said: "You've seen solid underperformance from Compaq on many days when IBM, Dell, Cisco and Microsoft have been strong. The initial reaction will be negative, but I think the market will sort out the group."

George Walker in Moscow, where he will run a Western-style lottery alongside his system for betting on British horses

Walker wins Russian lottery

FROM JON ASHWORTH
IN MOSCOW

GEORGE WALKER, the former Brent Walker chairman and one-time champion boxer, has won the licence to set up and run the first Western-style lottery in the former Soviet Union.

TeleTot, offering weekly jackpots of $1.5 million, will go live in Moscow later this year, backed by all-British technology. Ticket numbers will be relayed via satellites to a computer centre in Bristol, using a system which currently allows Russian punters to bet on British horses and greyhounds. Money raised will be ploughed into good causes in and around Moscow.

The deal is a coup for Mr Walker, 70 this week, who has shrugged off his past troubles to make a slow fight back to respectability. Thrown out of Brent Walker by the banks, he was declared bankrupt and pursued by the Serious Fraud Office amid allegations of theft and false accounting. Cleared of all charges, he turned his attention to Russia, first importing cigarettes and then bringing racing via satellite. He has rented a house outside Moscow and spends much of his time here, accompanied by his wife Jean.

Lotteries are not new to Russia, but this will be the first to use an online system. Camelot, which runs the UK lottery, had been interested in the Moscow licence. TeleTot will initially cover greater Moscow, with a catchment of 20 million people. It hopes to have 5,000 lottery terminals in place by the end of the year. Tickets will cost 10 roubles (about 13p).

Punters watch the Grand National live in Moscow using the same technology that will make the lottery possible. Commentary is provided by Russian presenters in a studio in East London. Mr Walker said: "We've got an operation going that's smarter and more sophisticated than the existing one in the UK and far better than the one in America."

Mr Walker is chief executive of Premier Telesports, which hopes to have 1,000 tote betting machines in Moscow by the end of the year. Premier's backers include George Soros, the billionaire Wall Street investor, and Mr Walker hopes to float Premier on Nasdaq within the next two years.

Gaming aside, Mr Walker is eager to participate in the regeneration of Moscow. He has identified a derelict horse-racing track as the potential site for a huge inner-city retail, commercial and residential complex — repeating what he did with Brent Cross in London in 1974.

United criticises Heathrow cutbacks

By ARTHUR LEATHLEY
AVIATION CORRESPONDENT

THE world's biggest airline has issued a blunt warning to ministers not to scale down Heathrow's role as the premier airport for international flight connections.

Executives of United Airlines voiced concern that Whitehall officials are investigating ways of reducing dependence on Heathrow for linking European passengers with the US and the Far East.

United's managers say that UK business interests will be damaged if the airport is made to cut a network serving 200 destinations worldwide.

Jon Moss, United's regulatory affairs director, said that UK airlines would suffer most from any reduction of connecting at Heathrow. He said: "It would be a bad mistake. You would minimise the role that UK carriers play in the global market. The economic impact of putting international passengers through is enormous."

"It is inconceivable that people travelling to Europe from the US would be prepared to fly to the Continent for a short flight back to the UK."

Whitehall officials have been considering shifting traffic to other British airports, particularly Gatwick, Stansted and Luton. They have even been told by ministers to consider the possibility of promoting rival foreign airports, such as Paris, Frankfurt and Amsterdam, if Heathrow becomes dangerously congested.

The government rethink is part of a two-year review of airport capacity in South-East England before a decision, expected in 2001, on whether to build a fifth terminal at Heathrow, which is struggling to cope with 60 million passengers a year.

Sainsbury to cut 350 jobs at head office

By SAIED SHAH

J SAINSBURY, the supermarket group that has been losing market share to competitors, is to announce the redundancy of 650 managerial staff this week as part of a drastic cost-cutting programme.

Some 350 jobs will go at Sainsbury's London headquarters — a tenth of head-office staff — including ten divisional managers and 70 other senior executives. The headquarters of Savacentre, the group's hypermarket-style stores, will see 300 further job losses.

Sainsbury, which has lost the top food retailing spot to Tesco, is due to make a fourth-quarter trading statement on Friday. The supermarket has disappointed the City with an expensive advertising campaign, "Value to Shout About", featuring John Cleese, which failed to boost sales after its launch last autumn. Sales at Tesco rose by 4 per cent in the 19 weeks to the end of January, against Sainsbury's poor 1.2 per cent rise. Tesco is expected to emphasise its lead when it issues full-year results tomorrow and announces 10,000 new jobs to keep pace with rapid expansion. Friday's statement by Sainsbury is unlikely to cheer investors after bruising from Asda and Tesco price-cutting.

Adriano: under pressure

Under pressure to win back market share, Dino Adriano, Sainsbury's chief executive, has decided to attack costs and bureaucracy and to project a new image, to be unveiled with a new logo and a fresh campaign in early summer.

The recent departures of Rosemary Thorne, Sainsbury's finance director, and David Clapham, director of special business and services, are thought to be part of the new strategy. Analysts said that Sainsbury wants a heavy-weight finance director, especially to handle the City.

NPC chief takes to the road

By SAIED SHAH

BOB MACKENZIE is quitting as chief executive of National Parking Corporation, the UK car parks and Green Flag business owned by Cendant, the US consumer services group (Saeed Shah writes).

Mr Mackenzie was behind Cendant's failed £450 million bid for the Royal Automobile Club's motoring and breakdown division, which was to be merged with Green Flag, its own breakdown service provider. The deal was blocked by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in February.

Cendant bought NPC, which owns 500 NCP car parks and Green Flag, last March for £801 million and followed this up with the RAC bid.

Mr Mackenzie, who is to be replaced by Ken Gaskell, chief operating officer, said he wanted to go on to other businesses that needed restructuring.

Underpaid at £1,000 a day

By SAIED SHAH

PITY the poor non-executive director, who is overworked and underpaid at £1,000 a day, according to a report by KPMG, the accountancy firm.

A KPMG survey discovered that non-executive directors now face greater pressures and more demands on their time than at the time of the last such survey by the firm four years ago.

"The job is no longer attending a meeting once a month," Gerry Acher, senior partner at KPMG's London office, said. "It is not the gravy train it once was."

The survey, of 130 non-executive directors, found that they were paid about £15,000 a year for a FTSE 350 company directorship and about £30,000 for a FTSE 100 firm. The workload amounts to about 26 days a year, including preparation time for meetings.

Mr Acher said that there are new pressures in the job stemming from corporate governance issues and a greater requirement to get immersed in the business.

He said: "It is often a very lonely position and the risks to your reputation are immense. For the level of experience required, and bearing in mind that you have to meet your own office expenses, I believe the pay is inadequate."

It is odd, then, that the survey found that these undervalued stalwarts were not doing a terribly good job, especially those outside the FTSE 100.

Non-executive directors are described in the report as "passive receivers of poor-quality information". It adds that "a significant minority do not follow accepted procedures and three-quarters receive no assessment themselves".

Mr Acher said: "Their knowledge of e-commerce and how it affects their business is often woefully inadequate, even within the FTSE 100. They must stop being passive receptors and seek out the information they need to do their job well."

Are they deserving, then, of a pay rise? Mr Acher said that it is precisely because of these shortcomings that the job needs to be better compensated, in order to attract candidates of superior quality.

At present, he said, many potential candidates prefer to work as consultants, which carries no risk to their reputation and brings pay of £1,200 to £1,700 a day.

Mr Acher recommends a rise of a third in directors' compensation, possibly paid in shares, over the next couple of years.
